Chicago Notices of Kreidler's Amonasro.

Of forceful quality was Kreidler, the baritone. In the several seasons he has sung in Chicago he has invariably set himself at a high level of efficiency and maintained it with ease. It was so last night. His Amonasro was a brilliant performance.—Journal.

Mr. Kreidler also deserves commendation for the admirable enunciation of his words. . . . He is a baritone with brains as well as voice.—Herald.

Mr. Kreidler is well known here and a fine artist he is. He gave a striking interpretation of Amonasro, his voice was resonant and he made his words tell.—Evening Post

. . . Both vocally and dramatically his portrayal of Amonasro was an excellent one. His enunciation was particularly clear.—Examiner.

Louis Kreidler, who is unfailingly capable, brought an untired voice to the part of Amonasro and succeeded in the almost impossible task of making that Ethiopian regal in appearance.—Daily News.

Louis Kreidler's dramatic and forceful delineation of the Ethiopian king is gem of the performance.—Chicago American. (Advertisement.)

Helene Koelling's Views.

According to Helene Koelling, the German coloratura soprano, "Human nature is a mixture of strange qualities. It has always been a mystery why some people prefer antagonism to assistance. If everybody would foster art and help artists, what a paradise this world would be. The world, however, is full of philistines who seem to take intense delight in making the road as rough and difficult as possible. This delight is not always due to jealousy or to dislike, but just to an innate proclivity to take the opposite view.

"There are a lot of persons who are opposed to any new idea or observation because they hate to admit that anything could have escaped them. When you advance a very simple but new idea, you are sure to be attacked, not because the idea is faulty, but because you happened to be the one to have thought of it or to have advanced it. Artists, musicians, teachers do not like to be told that there is anything in their art that they have overlooked. So, if one encounters opposition, there is no use in complaining or in finding fault. One cannot change this world or alter its character. The only thing to do is to keep pushing ahead until the opposition or you succumb.

"There are certain views about singing and other phases of art which deviate from those generally accepted—as, for instance, that singing is something more than mere vocalism—and which sooner or later must be recognized. Folksongs prove that song is the extension of sustained speech. Every one knows that natural instinct for the suitable expression of thought carries primitive people into dance and song. All can comprehend that there is a natural melodic inflection in spoken words identical with the melodic line of song. If language is allowed to sing itself the result is a direct expression of the inner life. Few, however, realize this. Most persons speak in a careless, inartistic, unnatural manner; yet they express their inner life by means of that speech. What if they studied speech as carefully as they do styles and modes of living? This world would be transformed into one of song. If all would but realize the truth of this simple statement, there would be more good singing and less bad singing. Therefore we should all enter into an unconscious agreement with each other to assist each other in bringing about this most desirable condition. It will not hurt us to play the good Samaritan for the cause of art."

GITTELSON

VIOLINIST

"He proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach Chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition and the three dances were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish."

—K. C. B. in Boston Daily Advertiser, Nov. 7, 1914.

George Hamlin's Recital.

George Hamlin showed a preference for English and German songs at his New York recital, given in Aeolian Hall, Wednesday afternoon, December 9. The only exceptions were the Lalo aria, from "Le Roi d'Ys," and "Il bosco mormora'" Bettinelli. Two novelties, "Nachtgesang," by Rudolf Ganz, the Swiss pianist, and "Deine Blumen," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, the American composer, both dedicated to Mr. Hamlin, were given deservedly prominent place on the program.

"In Thee I Bear So Dear a Part," Haydn, the opening number, directly reaffirmed the Chicago-Philadelphia Grand Opera Company tenor's intelligent and fine style of singing to a good sized audience. Three Schubert songs, "An eine quelle," "Liebhaber in allen Gestalten" and "Der Wandrer an den Mond," further verified his versatility in interpretation. Vigor and spirit infused into the Schumann songs, "Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn" and "Der Hidalgo," developed a splendid climax to the first group, bringing such convincing applause that Mr. Hamlin was obliged to add another number.

The second group contained the Lalo aria; Three Little Songs: "Frage" (Von Eyken), "Ich und Du" (Fleck) (repeated) and "Du Milchjunger Knabe" (Sinding) and the Ganz and Beach songs, before mentioned.

Group three included Carpenter's "When I Bring You Colored Toys," Grieg's "At the Brookside" and "Two Brown Eyes." Weingartner's "Post Im Walde," delivered with exceptionally good light and shade, and likewise repeated, and Strauss' strongly effective "O süsser Mai!"

The Bettinelli "Il bosco mormora" ("Forest Murmurs"), a subtly ingratiating number, due to Mr. Hamlin's fine art in interpretation, afforded unusually keen pleasure. This headed the final group. Three quaint Herrick poems, set to music by Roger Quilter, "The Bracelet," "The Maiden Blush" and "The Night Piece" (encored), and the "Hermann nocturne, completed the program.

Two numbers, one, the catchy old song by Lover, "I'm Not Myself at All," were added at the conclusion because the audience was so insistent.

Mr. Hamlin's vocal technic and mastery in interpretation are too familiar to New York musicians to need expatiating. His New York vocal appearances are always welcomed with pleasure by lovers of art in singing.

Richard Hageman played the accompaniments.

Percy Grainger, Composer-Pianist.

Percy Grainger, the Australian composer-pianist, has completed arrangements with Antonia Sawyer for some appearances in America. Mr. Grainger is equally well known in Europe as a composer and as a pianist, and it would be impossible to say which of these two branches of his activities is the more important. He has played almost innumerable concerts all over Europe and always with enviable success. He has been heard also in South Africa, as well as in his own native Australia. It may be added that he is almost equally well known as a conductor, and all of his various activities have been received with enthusiasm such as is reserved for very few in Germany, Russia, Austria, Holland, Scandinavia, South Africa, Australia, as well as in England; indeed everywhere except in the United States, where he is only now making his debut.

His compositions were first introduced to America by Kurt Schindler, who performed his choruses, "I'm Seventeen Come Sunday," "Irish Tune From County Derry," and his truly remarkable, barbaric number, "Father and Daughter," in which forty guitars and mandolins are added to the orchestra, with the MacDowell Choir of the Schola Cantorum. Since that time various other works have been performed by the New York Musical Art Society, New York Symphony Society, Chicago Symphony Orchestra and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. It seems almost as if the European popularity of the Grainger compositions is to be repeated on this side of the water, for groups of his orchestral works have already been performed twice in New York, once in Brooklyn, four times in Pittsburgh, and in many other cities of the United States and Canada, while several reperformances of former successes are noted by the Chicago and Minneapolis Symphony Orchestras.

Mr. Grainger was born at Brighton, Australia, in 1884, and he gave his first concert in Melbourne at the age of ten. His first teacher was his mother, but, while yet a boy, Professor Pabst, of the Moscow Conservatory, heard him play and was so much struck by the performance that he begged to be allowed to take him as his pupil. Later he went to Germany and for six years he studied under Prof. J. Kwast, at Frankfort, and he afterward received lessons from Ferruccio Busoni. About fourteen years ago he went to London, where he has made his home ever since, except when on tour. A few years before the death of the composer, Edvard Grieg, Percy Grainger made his acquaintance, and a warm friendship sprang up between the two which lasted until the demise of the elder man.

At his death Grieg left Percy Grainger his gold watch and chain, which the latter always wears. Grieg wrote of the young pianist: "I wrote Norwegian peasant dances that none of my own countrymen can render, and here comes this young Australian and plays them as they should be played. He is a genius such as we Scandinavians must love."

As a composer Mr. Grainger has had a most extraordinary success. His "Mock Morris" was played by orchestras no less than five hundred times last year, while his more recent "Shepherd's Hey" can boast of even greater popularity. In Brighton, England, alone this little piece was performed by the local symphony orchestra no less than sixty times between September, 1913, and November, 1914. His songs have also been very successful. His "Molly on the Shore," another orchestral composition, has been conducted in Holland and Germany by Mengelberg, Fritz Steinbach and Richard Strauss, in Norway by Halvorsen, and in Chicago by Stock and Schindler. And works by this talented young composer have been performed by leading orchestras in Wiesbaden, Frankfort, Mannheim, Vienna, Finland and Russia.

Gemünder Violin Osteopathy and Surgery.

The latest issue of the Violin World, published by A. Gemünder & Sons, 141 West Forty-second street, New York, has an original and interesting article with the foregoing caption by E. M. Sherwin. All of the "Pathys" are included in the violin healer's art. It is astonishing to compare the violin with the human body as is done in this article, which speaks of loose joints, the ribs, pores choked with camphor, and many other points of similarity, including that of dermatology.

Quoting a portion of the article, it is as follows:

Allopathy, homœopathy, osteopathy, chiropractic, surgery, and that part of the Healer's art consisting of the "laying on of hands," all are practiced in the repair corner of the Gemünder Atelier.

A great many instruments coming to this "imfirmary" require but mild treatment—osteopathic treatment, one might say. A little pressure applied here or there—to move the post a trifle, or to set the bridge more firmly on its feet often works miracles in the one of a violin or cello.

Quite often a violinist has a habit of using strings too light or too heavy for his instrument. He can't be expected to know the proper gauge to use. Once his instrument is adjusted by the Gemünders, a record of the proper gauge strings for that instrument is kept on file, and ever after the owner of the instrument is free from string troubles due to gauge of string and strength of top board being incompatible.

The Gemünders are Dermatologists, too, if you please. The cuticle they work in is varnish. They know the pigments of every kind and color of varnish, and can tell almost at a glance whether or not something is radically wrong with your violin's "cuticle."

Very often they find a good old instrument suffering from the results of malpractice—a repair man may have choked all the wood-pores with camphor or some other filler to make his flint-like varnish lay smooth.

Lily Strickland's Songs in Demand.

Lily Strickland's "Negro Melodies of the Old South" have been sung recently with success by the Weber Quartet in Peekskill, N. Y., New York City, University of Vermont, Burlington, Vt., and at Stony Brook, N. Y. "My Lassie," another very fascinating song from the pen of this talented composer, is a favorite with Reed Miller and has been sung by him in Lander College, S. C., Wofford College, S. C., and Syracuse, N. Y.. Vernon Archibald also uses this song, having sung it, and "Mammy's Prayer," in New York recently.

Alda Wanted in Milan.

Frances Alda, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, received a cablegram last week from the director of La Scala at Milan, Italy, asking her if she would sing the leading role in "Rigoletto" at that institution on December 23. Of course the soprano's engagements in New York will prevent her going abroad at this time.

Leonard Borwick Charms Again.

Aside from his remarkable musical and pianistic qualities, Leonard Borwick possesses also the ability to construct unusual programs, as was exemplified again at his third New York recital at Carnegie Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, December 8. The list of numbers selected by this resourceful English pianist consisted of Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," Leonardo Leo's (1694-1744) arietta, Scarlatti's B flat prestissimo, Schumann's C major fantasie, Rachmaninoff's prelude in G minor, Mendelssohn's "Characteristic Piece, in A," Schubert's F minor "Moment Musical," Debussy's "Reflets dans l'eau" and Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 12.

It would be difficult to imagine more polished and delightful piano playing than Leonard Borwick demonstrated in those pieces on his program calling for mobility of finger, transparency of touch, and delicacy of musical conception. With exquisite tonal gradations and the most subtle pedal management he conjures from the modern grand piano tints as archaic as those of the spinet, and it goes without saying that for Handel, Leo and Scarlatti such treatment was ideal.

However, the Borwick art does not confine itself to any one specialty and therefore in such a thoroughly romantic and at times passionate work as the Schumann fantasie, the player showed himself to be as much at home as in the naive titbits of antiquity, and he gave a reading of the mammoth composition which glowed with warmth and was instinct with kindling imagination. The hands that knew how to stroke the keys so caressingly in the earlier part of the afternoon, suddenly became muscled with prodigious power, and in the first movement of the fantasie we heard a Borwick who knew how to thunder his declamation and illumine it flashingly with the most fiery of the musical orators. Again, the very soul of poetry was in his gentle sounding of the slow section and proved that always he adapts himself to the music and never forces it to fit any arbitrary style of his own, as is the case with so many pianists who ride specialties in technic and in emotional exposition as well.

Glittering finger wizardry marked the Mendelssohn number, tenderness the Schubert playing, shimmering beauty the Debussy presentment, and irresistible dash the Liszt performance.

Many professional pianists, students and discriminative laymen regard the Borwick recitals as characteristic lessons; they are more than that, they are a liberal education in refined and thoroughly artistic piano art.

Deverell School Transferred to New York.

Frances E. Deverell, the founder and director of the Deverell School for Girls, Paris, announced some time since that her school in Paris being indefinitely closed on account of the war, she would open a temporary school in New York until the cessation of hostilities. The location of this school is now announced as 37 Madison avenue, New York. It will be conducted on the same principles as the foreign school, which was deservedly popular and had a large attendance. This New York school is located in a large apartment overlooking Madison square. The house is exclusive and conservative, and the location gives easy access to concerts and theatres. Miss Deverell has also her music studio at the same address, and her ability as a teacher of the famous method of Isidore Philipp has already brought her many requests for lessons. Some of her piano pupils are living outside the school. After the holidays, Miss Deverell announces, she will be able to accommodate additional pupils.

This school carries with it all the advantages of the French school. It is a strictly French house. Mme. Sergère, the widow of the well known French diplomat, is in charge of this department and French is spoken at all times in the school-home.

Educational Alliance Concert.

In the Strauss Auditorium of the Educational Alliance, New York, the following program was given on Sunday evening, December 13, by a quintet headed by Maximilian Pilzer:

String quartet, A minor.....Ippolitow-Iwanow
Quartet for piano, violin, viola and cello, E flat.....Beethoven
String quartet, G minor.....Grieg

These excellent concerts are given for educational and philanthropic purposes at a nominal charge of admission.

Kernochan Songs Sung.

New York concertgoers frequently run across the name of Marshall Kernochan, composer of many beautiful songs recently published. He has also composed works for women's voices, more especially, "The Foolish Virgins," which was produced at East Orange, N. J., in May, 1914.

December 8, at Aeolian Hall, New York, Mrs. Frank King Clark sang his short but very effective song, "We Two Together." Many prominent concert artists are singing Kernochan songs.

Mme. Riheldaffer a Busy Artist.

On December 10, the gifted soprano, Grace Hall Riheldaffer, completed a successful tour through the Middle Western States. From October 8 until that date she had filled thirty-eight engagements. When she appeared at Adrian, Mich., the house was completely sold out three days before the concert, and she received a veritable ovation. At Warren, Pa., her name in big electric letters was placed over the pavement in front of the opera house where the concert was given. In 1915, Mme. Riheldaffer will go to the Pacific Coast, where she has already a score and more of engagements booked. She will take with her a violinist and a pianist, and she expects to enjoy as great a success as on the tour just closed.

U. S. Kerr's Window-Card Creates Desire to Sing in Inebriate

An amusing incident was related to U. S. Kerr in Youngstown, Ohio, where he appeared in a song recital lately. A young man, who had been imbibing too freely, stood in front of a window gazing at the picture of Mr. Kerr. Suddenly he began to sing so lustily that he attracted a large crowd. Some of the cynical auditors wondered "if it weren't really just an advertising scheme after all."

MacDowell Works Propagated.

Edward MacDowell's place in the piano repertoire of the concert stage is being upheld valiantly by his countrywoman, Florence Larrabee. This pianist selected his second concerto in D minor for her appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and later she played it in Germany. While abroad she cooperated with Mme. Carreño and Augusta Cottlow in making propaganda for the piano works of America's great composer.

A Beebe Appearance.

In addition to her duties as a teacher, Carolyn Beebe, the New York teacher of piano, whose studio is at Steinway Hall, is accepting some engagements to appear as piano soloist. On November 15 she was heard at the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Barron, Rye, N. Y. As is usual when Miss Beebe appears, her brilliant technic and thoughtful interpretations won for her the appreciative applause of her audience.

"Marie Antoinette" at Rubinstein Club.

"Marie Antoinette at Versailles" is the title given a costume program to be given by Frances Pelton-Jones, the harpsichordist and pianist, assisted by Florence de Courcy, contralto; William Wheeler, tenor, and William M. Kincaid, flutist, at 2 p. m. December 19, before the Rubinstein Club of New York. This promises to be an altogether unique and charming affair.

Foreign Tributes to Florence Macbeth.

First of all there was the reappearance of Florence Macbeth, the young coloratura soprano, who made such a sensational debut among us last year. . . . once again her triumph was instantaneous. . . . The equally exacting mad scene from Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor," which she sang with all the sureness and brilliance of an experience singer in her prime. . . .—The Daily Telegraph, London, June 5, 1914.

In these days of violation of tonality it was a simple but sincere pleasure to hear the artless and conventional cadenzas of Bellini and Donizetti sung with such naiveté and ease. Miss Macbeth has all the technic and phenomenal range of her illustrious contemporaries and a spiritual purity of tone in her middle register that is all her own.—The Globe, London, June 5, 1914.

. . . In both, the evenness of her scales and the delicate elan of her "agilita" proved her to be already on a very high plane of her art.—The Standard, London, June 5, 1914.

. . . With remarkable flexibility of voice, purity of tone, and ease of production, she sang the difficult cadenzas without any trace of effort.—The Liverpool Daily Courier, October 7, 1914.

Miss Macbeth has legitimate qualifications for the description of "the new Patti." Her voice is of wonderful clarity, but while crystal-like, it is fresh and warm, and the tone pure. . . .—Birmingham Evening Dispatch, October 13, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, the new Patti, possesses charm, the simplicity which has such attraction, pure quality of tone and excellent technic. . . . Decidedly Florence Macbeth was successful, and will be welcomed in Birmingham again and again.—Birmingham Gazette and Express, October 13, 1914.

Florence Macbeth is the heroine of one of our periodic British concert sensations. She was hailed as a second Tetrazzini, the new Patti, and so forth. She needs no such vicarious glory. Her gifts and attainments are sufficient for her to stand alone as one of the most talented English-speaking singers we have heard for a decade.

FLORENCE MACBETH,
As the Doll in "Tales of Hoffmann."

Her fame rests primarily on her coloratura singing and an extraordinary compass. The quality of her voice is fuller and richer than is usually found in fioriture singers. She can enliven or caress it into a tone of deep beauty. . . .—Sheffield Daily Telegraph, October 14, 1914.

. . . Florence Macheth, who has already established her fame in this country as a vocalist of rare musical gifts, her voice being of a remarkably pure and brilliant timbre.—Birmingham Daily Mail, October 13, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, the American soprano, gave the greatest satisfaction. She is a brilliant vocalist, possessing perfect control of a clear, high-pitched voice. . . .—Sheffield Independent, October 14, 1914.

Miss Macbeth delighted the audience with her polished bravura singing. . . .—Manchester, England, News, October 15, 1914.

Florence Macbeth, the American soprano, had a very enthusiastic reception. Her solos included operatic pieces of a kind demanding exceptional technical skill and flexibility of voice, and these qualities were fully displayed by the clever young singer, who sang throughout with fluency of diction, fine tone-color, and without any trace of effort she was particularly successful in the enormously difficult polacca from "Mignon" singing the cadenzas and roulades with remarkable sureness and finish.—Liverpool Courier, October 16, 1914.

Interest centred principally in Miss Macbeth, who has been spoken of as a "second Adeline Patti. . . . Miss Macbeth has a clear and beautiful tone, and in the first item she used it with that Metropolitan Life Concert.

Last evening, December 15, the Metropolitan Life Glee Club, Wilbur A. Luyster, director, gave its first evening concert of the seventh season at Assembly Hall, 1 Madison avenue, New York. The club has grown steadily under Mr. Luyster's leadership, being now composed of sixty members.

A complete review of the concert will appear in next week's issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Queena Tillotson, a soprano pupil of Oscar Saenger, appeared on the same program with Karl Jörn, tenor, and Leonard Borwick, pianist, at the annual concert for the German Poliklinik given at the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, December 1.

Miss Tillotson, for whom Mr. Saenger predicts a splendid career, already has a number of concert engagements for this season.

RICHARD STRAUSS LEADS HIMSELF AND OTHERS IN BERLIN.

Composer Conducts Mozart and Beethoven Better Than His Own Works—Nikisch Concert Draws Large Audience—Emil Sauer's Recital—American Kitchen in Berlin—German Capital Tolerant of Musical Belligerents.

Jenaerstr. 21,
Berlin, W., November 13, 1914.

The program of the second concert of the Royal Orchestra under Richard Strauss brought Mozart's E flat and Beethoven's D major symphonies and Strauss' "Heldenleben." Curiously enough, Strauss seemed to be much more in accord with Mozart than with his own creation. The celebrated composer never has been the best interpreter of his own works. I once heard him say to Nikisch after that supreme conductor's unique interpretation of "Heldenleben" that he did not realize it contained so many beauties.

Strauss' reading of the delightful Mozart symphony was all that could be desired. It was exquisite, finished, classic. The early Beethoven symphony also received a masterful rendition at his hands. But the "Heldenleben" lacked the heroic proportions that Nikisch gives it. It was played, however, with great clearness and loving attention to detail. The war seems to have no effect whatever on the attendance at these Strauss concerts, for the house again was full to overflowing.

Second Nikisch Concert.

An interesting feature of the second Philharmonic concert under Nikisch was the singing of four Brahms lieder by Elena Gerhardt, with orchestral accompaniment by Max Reger. These lieder were "Waldeinsamkeit," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," "Wir wandelten" and "Auf dem Kirchhof." Instrumentation never was Reger's forte, and the orchestral setting of these songs does not add to their effectiveness. The original piano accompaniments by the composer are to be preferred. Nevertheless, the orchestral coloring is very interesting, particularly in "Auf dem Kirchhof." Elena Gerhardt sang the songs magnificently, being in excellent form. She was also heard in three lieber by Beethoven, also with orchestral accompaniments.

The instrumental numbers were Brahms' "Tragic" overture, two excerpts of Hans Pfitzner's opera: "Die Rose vom Liebesgarten," and Beethoven's A major symphony. The Pfitzner excerpts entitled "Blütenwunder" and "Trauermarsch" contain many beauties. The funeral march particularly, which begins in a soft dreamy manner and works up to a tremendous climax, is an interesting and effective concert number. The "Blütenwunder" is full of peculiar modern instrumental effects, but it made little impression as a whole. It is too meagre in thematic content. These novelties were presented by Nikisch in a way that would have gladdened the heart of the composer could he have been present. The great conductor also gave magnificent readings of the overture and Beethoven's symphony. This second concert was even better attended than the first being in all its external aspects quite comparable with the former Philharmonic concerts in ordinary seasons.

Emil Sauer Plays.

Emil Sauer has lost none of his old power over the German public, as was demonstrated with his great success last Friday evening, when Beethoven Hall presented much the same appearance as it does in times of peace at his recitals. The pianist was in one of his most genial moods. He made his instrument sing and talk almost as if it were a human being. Very beautiful was his tone in all of its manifold gradations, while his crisp, pearly, infallible technic was a joy to hear. Sauer opened his program with Friedemann Bach's interesting old concerto in D minor, of which he gave an excellent performance. Beethoven's sonata, op. 27, and Schumann's "Symphonic Etudes," also were given masterful interpretations. In Schumann, Sauer rose to great pianistic and musical heights. Compositions by Chopin, Liszt and Sauer followed with the inevitable encores at the conclusion of the program. It was a triumphant evening for the guest from Dresden.

A New Trio Formed.

Berlin's many excellent chamber music organizations again have been augmented, a new trio having been formed, with Max Fiedler, pianist; Leopold Premyslav, concertmaster of the Royal Orchestra, violin, and Eugenie Stolz-Premyslav, his wife, cello. The new organization gave its first concert in Bechstein Hall on Tuesday evening, scoring a flattering success. The three artists were heard in a classical program consisting of Mozart's G major, Brahms' B major, and Beethoven's D major trios. The ensemble is not yet perfect; there could be greater finesse in point of nuances. The three artists, however, offered much that was beautiful and convincing in their playing. They are mature, experienced musicians and their combination is a distinct gain for the musical life of Berlin. Their first concert was well attended.

The Hess Trio.

The Willy Hess Trio is giving a series of three concerts this season at the Singakademie. This organization is justly popular in Berlin, the three artists, Willy Hess, Georg Schumann, and Hugo Dechert being chamber music performers par excellence. At the first trio evening, which was well attended, the program brought the trios by Dvorák in F major, Mozart in E major, and Schumann in F major, all works that are comparatively seldom heard. The Hess programs always are interesting and never hackneyed. The artists were in fine form, and there was really nothing to criticize in their playing. Willy Hess, the leader, is a very busy man. He plays quartet, trio and solo in public, teaches both privately and at the high school and conducts the High School Orchestra. Georg Schumann, who is the director of the Berlin Singakademie, is no less active, and the same can be said of Hugo Dechert, who is the first cellist of the Royal Orchestra. Yet the three artists find time to rehearse and thus to offer chamber music performances of rare finish and beauty.

MUSICALLY INCLINED WOUNDED SOLDIERS IN BERLIN.

Lehrer-Gesang-Verein Sings.

No less than seventy members of the Berlin Lehrer-Gesang-Verein, one of the leading local male choirs, now are serving in the army. Substitutes have been found, however, and the concerts of this most excellent body of singers are being given as usual. On Saturday evening I heard the choir in the large concert hall of the Royal High School and found that their artistic excellence had suffered but little by the change made in the personnel. Felix Schmidt, their conductor, has been doing some very energetic rehearsing of late. Works for male chorus by Mozart, Weber, Robert Kahn, Friedrich Hegar, Otto Taubmann, and Rudolf Beck were sung with great spirit and precision and commendable dynamic effects.

Lola Artôt di Padilla, the popular lyric soprano of the Royal Opera, had been announced as a soloist, but a sudden indisposition prevented her from appearing, and a substitute was found in Hertha Dehmlow, the well known contralto. Madame Dehmlow sang several lieder with much temperament and dramatic form. She lacks the lovely voice and charm of delivery of Padilla, but I should think her voice would be very effective in dramatic roles on the stage.

A large share of the applause of the evening was bestowed upon Edith von Vogdtländer, the youthful violinist of this city, who contributed three numbers to the program, playing first Max Bruch's romance in A minor and later Handel's largo arranged for the G string by Barmas, and the "Barucaba" variations by Paganini, arranged by Rosario Scalero. Fräulein von Vogdtländer is a very graceful performer. She plays technical difficulties with great ease and assurance, and her tone is sweet and appealing. She played by way of experiment on a cheap old Tyrol violin, the tone of which had been "veredelt" (literally, "ennobled") by Dr. Bielenberg, of this city. Dr. Bielenberg makes a specialty of improving violins in tone, quality and volume and in responsiveness. He is a young man possessing an extraordinary ear and other remarkable qualifications for this peculiar kind of work. The cheap instrument, on which Fräulein von Vogdtländer played, sounded astonishingly well in this large hall.

The proceeds of the concert were turned over to the relief fund for poor students in Berlin.

Interesting Beethoven Novelties.

An interesting concert was that given by the chamber music organization of the Royal Orchestra, which consists of eight musicians. These artists always present unhackneyed programs. The program of their first concert of this season was of particular interest because it introduced to Berlin two hitherto unknown compositions by Beethoven for wind instruments. Beethoven occasionally wrote for peculiar combinations of instruments of this class. These two works were written for oboe, three horns and bassoon. The compositions are supposed to have been written about the time of the "Eroica." They had been in private possession for many years and were recently discovered by Erich Prieger. Beethoven's handling of the three horns is remarkable and shows that he possessed a minute knowledge of the possibilities and limitations of these instruments. He employs the oboe much of the time in the highest positions. The ideas of the compositions are beautiful and one adagio in particular is thorough Beethovian in spirit. A further number of the program was Bach's fifth "Brandenburg" concerto for piano, flute and violin with string accompaniment. The slow movement of this is enchanting. An octet by Louis Ferdinand, the gifted prince who fell in the battle of Jena in 1806, followed. The octet is charming and quite in the style of Haydn and Mozart. Between the instrumental numbers Claire Dux, of the Royal Opera, sang lieder by Robert Kahn.

American Girl at Philharmonic "Pop."

At the Tuesday Philharmonic "Pop" concert, Frances Nash, of Omaha, was the soloist. Miss Nash was heard in Chopin's E minor concerto, of which she gave a praiseworthy performance. She possesses a fluent, reliable technic and a sympathetic touch. She plays with great ease, difficult passages seeming to cause her no more trouble than the simplest theme. Miss Nash is a gifted girl. What she needs to work for is greater contrasts and more temperament.

American Relief Kitchen in Berlin.

The accompanying photos of the American relief kitchen will be found of interest. The members of the American colony of Berlin generously have responded to the call for funds, so that enough money has been collected to feed 200 destitute people daily for the next six months. This kitchen was founded to show the American colony's appreciation to the municipal government of Berlin for the hospitality and protection given to the Americans here since the outbreak of the war. It was opened to the poor of Berlin on October 19. The kitchen is situated in a laboring district of the city in a good sized modern building with large rooms. It is an up to date kitchen, with modern equipment, especially suitable for the purpose. The meals are served by a hundred ladies of the colony, who are divided into committees of ten each. The kitchen is under the patronage of the American Ambassador and the American Consul General.

Berlin Notes.

One now sees here at the concerts large numbers of slightly wounded soldiers. Arrangements have been made by the largest concert agencies to have a certain number of free tickets distributed among these brave defenders of the Fatherland through the Red Cross. This praiseworthy movement also has been adopted by the Royal Opera and the Royal Playhouse.

The Berlin "Schubert Bund" is doing a splendid work by offering good music to the masses. This organization gives concerts for the working classes, which otherwise would never have an opportunity to hear good mu[illegible] several years the bund has been quietly worki[illegible] ing a vast amount of good. Eight hundred [illegible] far have been given since the founding of the [illegible]

The music publishers of Germany have been very hard hit by the war, as there is very little demand now for anything except patriotic compositions. The great music printing firm of Roeder in Leipsic has been fairly busy of late, however, publishing works of this nature. The music dealers also are having a hard time of it, and many of the smaller ones, who have no capital, will undoubtedly fail before the war is over.

Hermann Jadlowker, the Russian tenor, one of the stars of the Berlin Royal Opera, now is singing on that stage again. He made his reappearance as Alfredo in Verdi's "Traviata," receiving a cordial reception on the part of the public. The Germans are very tolerant in this respect. When the war is over, Germany, I think, undoubtedly will be the first of the fighting nations to open its portals to foreign virtuosi and singers.

The tenth "Bach Jahrbuch" for the year 1913 recently has been published by Breitkopf & Härtel. It contains much of interest concerning Bach and his works. An interesting chapter of the book is devoted to musical performances in Leipsic during Bach's life.

Mr. Virgil dwelt upon this theme in an interesting fashion, while Mrs. Virgil gave apt illustrations upon the clavier and the piano. Among the composers whose works were represented were Beethoven, Duvernoy, Jensen, Schumann, Mozart, Bach, Mendelssohn, Czerny and Kullak. The music lovers of St. Petersburg and vicinity were manifestly interested in the subject and the manner of its portrayal, as evidenced by the large attendance

How New York Estimates Florence Hinkle.

The song recital given by Florence Hinkle, soprano, . . . was more than one of the best recitals heard on that platform in a long time. It was the best recital ever given by Miss Hinkle. She held her audience charmed for nearly two hours. . . .

It was in the second group of songs that Miss Hinkle demonstrated her rarely smooth, sweet, high notes, a deft handling of rapid passages and a legato which was wonderfully simple and effective. The first of the group, "Du bist die Ruh," by Schubert, could have had no more reposeful rendering, and in the melodious, swinging passages of "Auf dem Wasser zu singen" there was an irresistible lilting quality of voice.—Press.

Florence Hinkle's position in the concert world is of the first rank. . . . In these days of half cultivated voices and half understood interpretations, the presence of a singer of Miss Hinkle's authority and art is a welcome relief to the enforced concert goer. . . . When all is said and done he must be a caviller who will find fault with Miss Hinkle's art. It is an art that is well grounded and sincere; she has at her command a mastery of technic that is rare upon the concert stage, and her voice itself . . . is one of great purity and one which she knows well how to color.—Tribune.

. . . Her captivating voice was at its best, and that means much. . . . The audience was large and Miss Hinkle honorably won the applause she got.—Evening World.

Florence Hinkle, a much admired local singer. . . . Her voice is of lovely quality, and she evinces more warmth and feeling than the average high soprano. . . .—Evening Post.

Florence Hinkle, known here chiefly for her admirable singing of oratorio. . . . Such singers as Miss Hinkle are welcome recitalists, if only for their intelligent taste in the manner and matter of their interpretations.—Evening Mail.

Florence Hinkle, soprano, sang large songs and small songs, well known songs and new songs, . . . and contributed to them charm, depth, buoyancy and warmth, as is her dower, she having the gift of song. . . . "Life and Death" Miss Hinkle sang eloquently. . . . —Brooklyn Eagle.

. . . Florence Hinkle, a young soprano, whose recent rise in her field has been rapid. Miss Hinkle is a pleasing singer and an intelligent one. Her voice is clear and true, and the compositions she sang yesterday gave evidence of careful preparation. . . . She will make a useful artist in a field where artists are few.—World.

It was good to recognize in the singing of Florence Hinkle . . . all the rare beauty of voice, all the admirable technical control, all the intelligence and genuinely musical feeling that have heretofore won high praise for her singing. . . .—Times.

By excellent singing at yesterday afternoon's recital in Aeolian Hall Florence Hinkle added to the favorable opinion which she had enjoyed in the past. Intelligence was displayed in her interpretations and her singing was satisfying in phrasing and tone production. . . .—Herald.

. . . Miss Hinkle is well and favorably known to all local concert goers, chiefly for her excellent art in the field of oratorio. Her song recitals, which have not been numerous, have also given much pleasure. . . . Her singing was interesting, and this is something worth noting. There are many who can sing remarkably well, but who cannot interest their hearers. Miss Hinkle's art . . . has distinct charm and it publishes a personality.—Sun.

After having earned success as a leading oratorio singer, Florence Hinkle has changed her field of endeavor, and yesterday afternoon at Aeolian Hall appeared as an interpreter of songs. . . . Her program was divided into four groups, in the presentation of which she illustrated her versatility vocally and linguistically. Her English songs were especially charming for clear enunciation of the texts, though that quality was noticeable also in the Italian, German and French numbers.—American.

The soprano, who has won the honor of a tour with the Boston Symphony this season, was in excellent voice, which is only saying that few native artists bring a more complete equipment to the delivery of varied songs. . . . Her Schubert "Du bist die Ruh" could hardly have been infused with more fitting delicacy and reposeful charm.—Evening Sun.

Florence Hinkle proved yesterday before a good sized audience that the art of her song has not fully enjoyed, until now, the appreciation due it from the musical world of New York. The artist sang with a beauty of tone which called forth repeated applause from the audience.—Staats-Zeitung. (Advertisement.)

Korngold's Work at Philharmonic.

On Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, December 10 and December 11, at Carnegie Hall, New York, the Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Josef Stransky, gave a program consisting of the new "Sinfonietta," op. 5, by Erich Korngold (played upon this occasion for the first time in New York), and selections from the pen of Richard Wagner. The Wagner portion of this program introduced some of the standard favorites which have been heard so often here and will, no doubt, be heard many, many times again.

Whether or not the Korngold composition will be heard with frequency in the future is a matter which it is not possible even to guess at after a single hearing. The work is called a "Sinfonietta," not because it is a diminutive symphony in size, but because the content is of a lighter character than is usual in works which are designated by that name. How old Korngold was when he composed this work, the present writer has no means of knowing, but the boy composer is only seventeen now and even at the comparatively mature age (that is, comparatively mature for this wonderful lad) it was an extraordinary feat to construct a composition so well made in every detail. There is no living composer who might not be proud to have penned this work, and, technically, at least, there is nothing that one may justly criticise.

Of course Korngold is a modern, and if one would understand how he has learned in so short a time that which it has taken some of the older composers half a lifetime, one must consult the authorities on heredity, for certainly there can be no other explanation of it. It is a well known fact that has been recorded through many generations, that in music the boy of one generation is born with ideas in advance of the most radical musician of the generation just preceding, and each of these youths in turn has been accused of harshness and excessive radicalism in the compositions of his early days.

Korngold's radicalism has every evidence of being inborn. His music flows easily and naturally in spite of the fact that he adheres to no fixed tonality or traditional form. There are many passages of extreme beauty and these passages would prove charming to any untrained musical ear were they but joined together with less radicalism in the harmonic structure. One has no right to criticise this method, for it is evident that the growth of modern music disregards more and more the simple tonalities of the older school, but it renders a work difficult to comprehend when every suggestion of a melody, simple enough at its start, is suddenly broken into by a modulation into an unrelated key. This was more noticeable in the first movement than in the others. The scherzo was perhaps the best suited to the tastes of the average concert goer.

Korngold's orchestration is exceptionally beautiful, possessing sonority, solidity and warmth, but with never a suggestion of monotony or sameness. Occasionally he makes use of entirely new combinations of instruments, such as the celeste, piano, two harps and bells, but for the most part he employs merely the full modern orchestra and he does so with the skill of an absolute master. One is impelled to say that it is a pity that the exquisite ideas and the wonderful technic shown in such a composition as this should not be presented in a form more palatable to the average concert goer. None the less this composition is extraordinary for a boy of seventeen and would be indeed extraordinary for a composer of any age.

The "Sinfonietta," and indeed the whole of the program, was splendidly played by the orchestra, whose members now constitute an uncommonly fine symphonic body which does everything well.

Philharmonic Society in Brooklyn.

Brooklyn was visited again by the Philharmonic Society of New York, Sunday afternoon, December 13, and the usual big audience greeted the fine and reliable musicians at the Academy of Music. This was the second subscription concert there this season.

Bach's suite in D opened the program. Its stately opening movement, the aria—the famous aria for G string—which brought to the fore the concertmaster, Maximilian Pilzer, and whose artistic delivery called forth especial acknowledgment from his hearers, together with the remaining gavotte, bourée and gigue, put the audience into the right humor directly. Beethoven's symphony, in C minor, at the hands of the Philharmonic artists was no less enjoyed.

The less serious Bizet, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1, followed the intermission.

Liszt's concerto in E flat, for piano and orchestra, was ably played by David Sapirstein. Chabrier's rhapsody, "España," the final item, sent the audience away with a feeling that these periodic visits of the Manhattan organization are decidedly musical "events" in the Brooklyn season, both from a cultural and enjoyment standpoint.

Who Is He?

There is a violinist living in New York at present whose name stands for all that is artistic and elevating, both as a performer and as a pedagogue. This gentleman has had a brilliantly successful career, which began in the little country of Belgium quite a number of years ago. He was educated at the Royal Conservatory of Liege, that celebrated institution, the gift of royalty, where mercenary motives have no place and where natural talent has every chance for the highest development. After winning the first prize at this conservatory at the age of twelve, he remained for three years longer to perfect himself in harmony, chamber music and conducting, when he received the Golden Medal. During those three years, in addition to his studies, he had concertized and had been taken to Paris by the famous master, Leonard. Then, too, he had successfully filled the engagements of Wieniawski, when that artist fell ill and was unable to go on tour. Next he journeyed to America, where he was acclaimed as a truly great artist. Since then he has been around the world several times, visiting the Hawaiian Islands, Australia, New Zealand, China, Japan, Java, and other Oriental countries, and everywhere he received the appreciation so justly merited.

Upon his return to Europe he was persuaded to accept the position of head of the violin department of the Royal Conservatory of Liege and his subsequent tours had to be arranged with special permission of His Majesty, the King of Belgium.

At one time he was violinist to the King of Holland, and he has appeared at the Royal courts of Germany, Russia, Japan, England, Norway, Sweden, and other European countries. During his many concert tours he has been associated with such celebritics as Patti, Christine Nilsson, Trebelli, Gerster, Sembrich, Thursby, Titiens, Parepa-Rosa, and others, and for years he was intimate with Sam Franko.

Press notices from Paris, London, Lille, Washington, D. C., Chicago, New York, Cleveland, Cincinnati, San Francisco, Buffalo, Liege, Ostend, Philadelphia, Boston, Montreal, Yokohama (Japan), Shanghai, Hong Kong, Singapore, and many other quarters of the globe all attest to his extraordinary ability as a player of his instrument.

Some time ago he established his school of virtuoso playing in New York, and has been very successful in graduating a number of excellent artists, among whom may be mentioned Mary Gailey and Florence Austin, who recently gave her own concert in Aeolian Hall before a distinguished audience of violin lovers. Among the many promising students at present with this master is Joseph Stoopach, who, although but a boy, is displaying a remarkable talent.

By this time the secret is out: this gifted artist is none other than Ovide Musin, ex-professor at the Royal Conservatory of Liege, Officier of the Order of Leopold (Belgium), Commander of the Order of Nisham Iftikar (France), Officer of the Order of Bolivar (Venezuela), and proud possessor of the Cross of Merit (Holland).

Washington Hears First Motet Concert.

Washington, D. C., December 10, 1914.

Last evening the Motet Choral Society under the direction of Otto Torney Simon, the energetic conductor of this able body of singers, gave the first of this season's unique and interesting concerts at Memorial Continental Hall. The subject of the entire concert was the spiritual growth from the darkness of death to the light of eternal life, the program being as follows:

Two Choruses of Death—
Death on the Hills (from the Russian of Maikov).....Elgar
In Thy Loving Arms (motet in five parts).....Franck
Two Choruses of Night—
Evening Scene (words by Coventry Patmore).....Elgar
Hail, O Moon (from the Kalevala, Finnish folksong)..Sibelius
(For male voices.)
Solos (for cello)—
Abendlied .....Schumann
Cantilena (A minor concerto).....Goltermann
Two Choruses of Morning—
The Dawn .....Matthews
Sunrise (from the Russian of Fiodor Tiutchef).....Taneyef
Four Choruses of Christmas—
Unto Us a Son Is Born (Messiah).....Handel
Ave Maria (for cello).....Bach-Gounod
Three Kings Have Journeyed.....Cornelius
(Baritone solo by John Waters.)
Heil'ge Nacht.....German Christmas song arranged by Damrosch
Hallelujah Chorus (Messiah).....Handel

In keeping with the spirit of the music and the words, the lighting in the hall during the first two numbers was very dim, gradually becoming brighter and brighter until every light was burning. During the singing of the four choruses of Christmas, the lights were all put out and a huge tree, typifying the tree of life, was illuminated.

The work of this chorus is so uniformly good there is nothing which can justly be criticised, and personal preference is the only factor which would tend to place one choral number above another in value. Mr. Simon's readings were broad and dignified and thoroughly in accordance with the religious tone of the works rendered. He has his singers under his complete control to a truly remarkable degree, which adds materially to the beautiful tonal effects which he is able to obtain.

Richard Lorleberg was the cello soloist and his playing of the two solos, as well as his work in the ensemble, was highly commendable. Mrs. Simon and George H. Wilson, pianists, also assisted in making this enjoyable evening one long to be remembered. J. ALBERT RIKER.

Moments Musicales at Waldorf-Astoria.

Vera Barstow, the young violinist; Carl Jörn, tenor; Paolo Martucci, pianist, and Lucy Gates, soprano, were the soloists at the first Moments Musicales given in the ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, on Friday afternoon last.

Miss Barstow plays with good taste, has a very unusual technic, and she produces a lovely tone. She met with much success on this occasion.

Lucy Gates, in the aria from "Lakme," exhibited a remarkable coloratura voice.

Mr. Martucci, who is the son of the famous composer, who died in Italy a few years ago, played his father's scherzo with much brilliancy.

Carl Jörn, the well known tenor of the Metropolitan Opera Company, sang several numbers in his usual style and was well received. A large audience was present, among them being a number of the Metropolitan Opera Company artists.

It was announced on the program that ten consecutive Friday afternoons will be given.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

Melody is among the lost arts.

The best critic is the one who keeps his opinions to himself. Beside, that method never gets him into an argument.

If it is advisable for some persons to think twice before speaking, how many times should certain other individuals think before singing?

At the Cologne Opera the experiment was tried recently to give Liszt's oratorio, "St. Elizabeth," as an opera. The action is not dramatic enough to justify such an attempt.

Rome reports by cable the death of Giovanni Sgambati, the most famous symphonic composer of Italy. He was seventy-one years old. It is too late to confirm the cable for this issue of the MUSICAL COURIER.

New York lovers of piano playing will hear some recitals this winter on which they did not count at the beginning of the season. Leopold Godowsky, Mark Hambourg and Alberto Jonas now are dwellers in our midst.

That public performer who suffered some startling lapses of memory at a recent New York concert did nothing worse than to remind those who noticed the slips that the player is after all human. Was it not Browning who said, "What's come to perfection perishes."

A new grand opera by an American composer—and a woman, too—will be presented in Chicago, December 29, at the Auditorium, under the auspices of the Aborn Opera Company. The name of the work is "Guido Ferrata," and the composer is Mrs. Alfred B. Andrews. Further particulars of the event may be found in the Chicago letter on another page.

At the next pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall by the Philharmonic Society on Thursday evening and Friday afternoon, December 17 and 18, Edouardo Ferrari-Fontana will be the soloist, in Beethoven's "Adelaide," and an aria from Verdi's "La Forza del Destino." Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, will comprise the orchestral list.

A description of a visit to the English training camps, written by Rudyard Kipling for the New York American, contains this passage relating to music: "There was no music—not even drums and fifes. I heard nothing but a distant skirl of the pipes. Trust a Scot to get his national weapon as long as there is a chief in the North! Admitting that war is a serious business, specially to the man who is being fought for, and that it may be right to carry a long face and contribute to relief funds which should be laid on the National Debt, it surely could do no harm to cheer the men with a few bands. Half the money spent in treating, for example."

Tabulating is the specialty of the music critic of the New York Tribune, and he tabulates exceedingly well. Last Sunday he tabulated the singers who have appeared in New York as Carmen. They included Minnie Hauk (she created the role here, October 23, 1878, three years and seven months after the Paris premiere), Clara Louise Kellogg (1878), Mme. Trebelli (1883-1884), Lilli Lehmann (1885), Adelina Patti (1887), Zelie de Lussan (1888), Louise Meisslinger, Selma Kronold, Calvé (she made her New York debut in 1893), Mira Heller, Rosa Olitzka, Lizzie Macnichols, Fanchon Thompson, Josephine Ludwig, Rose Cecilia Shay, Camille Seygard, Alice Gentle, Maria Gay, Signora Ferrabini, Lina Cavalieri, Marietta Mazarin, Mary Garden, Marion Yvell, Olive Fremstad, Mme. Bressler-Gianoli, Mme. Gerville-Reache, Marguerite Sylva, Kathleen Howard, Geraldine Farrar.

Arrigo Serato, the violinist, is meeting with such uncommon success on his tour in California that already he has been reengaged for another series of Pacific Coast concerts next season.

The city of Palestrina (formerly Praeneste) celebrated the four hundredth birthday of its illustrious musical son, Pierluigi da Palestrina, by unveiling a monument of him, done by Zocchi. In connection with the ceremonies, an exhibition was held, and most of the European museums and galleries were asked to search for hitherto unknown or lost pictures of Palestrina. The Tyrolean Landes Museum succeeded in discovering a splendid oil painting of the master done by his celebrated contemporary, Giovanni Battista Moroni, a pupil of Moretto. The picture was part of the rich legacy which the "Ferdinandeum" received in 1888 from the late Royal Councillor Ludwig Ritter von Wieser.

Weber's "Euryanthe" was discovered last Sunday by the New York daily newspapers, which told in great detail some biographical facts about Weber, described his significance in music, and recounted the story of his "Euryanthe." It is a useful proceeding and saves some of us the trouble of going to the library for our copy of Hughes' "Musical Guide." However, whether the general public is impressed by a composer's historical importance remains to be seen at the revival next Saturday afternoon. We rather imagine that the good tunes in "Euryanthe" will be found as good as ever and the dreary episodes as dreary as ever. The libretto always was, is, and ever will be, impossible, even more so than that of "The Magic Flute."

KANSAS STANDARDIZES.

At the recent Wichita (Kan.) annual convention of the Kansas State Music Teachers' Association a definite decision to standardize music teaching in Kansas was not only made, but also acted upon practically, as will be seen by reading the full details of the occasion in another column of the MUSICAL COURIER. As usual, a Western State is the first to show courage and progressiveness enough to adopt a new idea and put it into practice, while the East is shaking its head, pondering the step, and carefully measuring the "ifs," "ands," and "buts," and "perhapses."

The national standardization never can be realized until the local standardization comes to pass everywhere, but in order to accomplish local standardization a section must be imbued in its musical ranks with a goodly share of community interest—that is, a putting aside of individual preferences and selfish prerogatives for the sake of the common good. The Western cities grow great and significant so quickly because of this community interest, which is developed much more highly than in the East. Other Western States shortly will follow the example of Kansas, beyond a doubt, for they will understand immediately when they see the plan working, how important it is to bring into concord and practical affiliation the music teaching done in the schools and by private instructors. It is a proposition whose elementary ingredients ought to be patent to all the musicians in the United States—but it isn't.

The crowning blow will come to Eastern musicians (if they continue to refuse to fall into line on the question of standardization) when all the Western schools and communities will refuse to employ music teachers who are not versed in the standardized requirements. That eventuality is not as far off as some complacent persons might be inclined to suppose.

A BLOOMFIELD ZEISLER RECITAL.

Cultured, spiritual, endowed with true musical perspective and imbued with a fine sense of poetry, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler continues to be one of the most interesting keyboard personalities of our day, and the demand for her appearances remains one of the vexed problems of her existence, for she deeply loves her work as a pedagogue in Chicago and feels it her duty not to absent herself too frequently or too long from her large class of pupils. That is why her concert visits to our city are so rare and why when they do occur they excite so much attention and attract such a numerous paying clientele of professional musicians and lay concertgoers of the most intelligent kind.

Schubert's F minor "Moment Musical" and Beethoven's G major "Menuet" might seem at first sight too unimportant to begin a serious recital with. But Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler knows her public. At her New York recital in Aeolian Hall on Saturday afternoon, December 12, all her audience had arrived and was seated by the time she reached Beethoven's "Appassionata" sonata, which she was therefore able to play without the interruption that so often mars the opening numbers of a concert. Her interpretation of this noble work was powerful, dignified and at the same time sympathetic. It is so easy to be violent in those contrasting soft passages and fiery outbursts which have given this sonata its popular name. But Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler did not exaggerate these effects, notwithstanding the enormously increased volume of tone at her disposal, which the undeveloped piano of Beethoven's day could not have produced. Beethoven certainly never heard his sonata sound as well as it sounded on this occasion.

In the B flat mazurka, the C major and C minor etudes, the C sharp minor valse and the F minor ballade, all by Chopin, the recitalist seemed to please her audience most, if applause is a criterion. Her very brilliant technic, together with her pulsing temperament, her varied touch and her superb management of the pedal make her especially effective as an interpreter of Chopin.

And it is a fact that Paderewski himself never gave a clearer and more technically perfect performance of his "Theme Varié" in A major. Trills, scales and arpeggios were alike admirable, and the poetry of the interpretation could not be finer.

Schloezer's "Etude de Concert" was, of course, well played; but it did not require the services of a great artist, for it is after all only a technical tour de force. Nor is Schulz-Evler's arabesque on themes of Johann Strauss' "Blue Danube" waltz much better. In fact, the introduction is inane. The charming melodies of Strauss make the work a pleasing dessert at the end of a solid musical meal. But the stucco ornaments of Schulz-Evler add nothing of any permanent value to the original gems of Strauss. Needless to state, however, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler invested the piece with glittering attractiveness, and the audience was carried away with her dash as much as with the pyrotechnical effects which she made the keyboard send forth. Crowds of enthusiasts charged the platform of the hall at the end of the concert and under severe bombardments of cheers and applause forced the player to surrender a number of additional pieces from her repertoire. She capitulated gracefully and won another victory even in defeat.

ORCHESTRAL PRIZE OF $500.

Conditions of the $500 prize contest for the best orchestral composition in large form—symphony, fantasia or suite—to be held by the Illinois Music Teachers' Association, require first and foremost that the composer be an American, native born or naturalized. The rest of the rules follow:

1. The orchestral work entered in the contest must be a new composition, never before played in public

2. Scores must be accompanied by complete parts for symphony orchestra, sixty men.

3. The association reserves right for public performance of the successful composition in Chicago during March, 1915, at the Centralia convention in May, and at San Francisco, as often as the conductors of the Exposition orchestra desire to give it a public hearing. Otherwise the work is to remain the property of the composer.

4. The association also reserves the right to select for public performance at the Chicago concert, and for the 1915 convention any of the other compositions entered in the contest.

5. All compositions to be handed to the chairman of the prize contest committee (Glenn Dillard Gunn, 421 Fine Arts Building, Chicago), on or before January 1, 1915.

The committee is as follows: Glenn Dillard Gunn, chairman; Edgar Nelson, Thomas M. McBurney, Maurice Rosenfeld, Adolph Weidig, Walter Spry.

FRITZ KREISLER ACCLAIMED.

For reasons sentimental, martial and musical, but chiefly musical, Fritz Kreisler was accorded the reception of his life last Saturday afternoon, December 12, at Carnegie Hall, when he stepped before an auditory multitude which filled the huge house completely and overflowed onto the stage, where a number of chairs had been placed to answer to the emergency rush. For more than a half minute the Kreisler sympathizers continued the tumult of greeting, which could not be construed otherwise than as a sign of their joy at the escape of the great violinist from the fields of war where, according to accounts, he so nearly lost his life a few months ago.

When Kreisler finally was given a chance to settle down to the serious business of the afternoon, he demonstrated very quickly that whatever hardships he may have suffered at the front, they have left no injurious effect upon his art, which is of the same elevated and stimulating quality as before. In Handel's A major sonata, every measure was instinct with earnestness, deep musical feeling and noble tone. The Tartini "Devil's Trill" revealed the same superb bow, finger and interpretative technic which long ago made Kreisler's performances a thing of such intense enjoyment to discriminative listeners who love the proper balance between finesse and breadth.

A tremendous reading of the Bach chaconne finished the best part of the artist's program gloriously. It is in such a composition that Kreisler's remarkable musicianship shows itself most strikingly. He made the marvelous work exhibit its entire wealth of emotional depth and constructive and melodic beauty, and the result was a promulgation of irresistibly uplifting character. Kreisler's supreme mastery over every phase of the violin cannot be questioned after such a magic version of the Bach chaconne.

In shorter pieces, like Schumann's A major romance, a Gluck "Melodie" in D minor, a Mozart rondo in G major, the concert giver's arrangement of Dvorák's "Indian Lament" and his own world renowned "Caprice Viennois," Kreisler fairly set his hearers a-trembling with delight and they cheered, and trampled and clapped their feelings so freely that to the man at whom all this fine frenzy was directed, it must have sounded like a thunderstorm in the mountains.

The concluding Paganini caprice, No. 24, caused another outbreak of the cataclysmic variety and kept Kreisler adding encores to his program until their number constituted a little concert of their own.

KANSAS CITY HEARS OPERA.

Owing to the scarcity of grand opera performances outside of New York this season, it is doubtly interesting to read what Geneve Lichtenwalter, the Kansas City correspondent of the MUSICAL COURIER, has to say about the recent visit there of the San Carlo Company, which is the same organization that recently gave such a brilliant few weeks of opera in St. Louis under municipal patronage and support:

"Kansas City has seen, heard and enjoyed what seems to be her only grand opera for this season by visiting artists. Later, a week of grand opera by the Kansas City Grand Opera Association will give opportunity to hear five standard works.

"The San Carlo Grand Opera Company remained here five days and give five operas and one concert at the Willis Wood Theatre. This Italian company brought with it all the atmosphere and accessories of real Italian opera. Its distinct national flavor was a delight to the professional musician as well as to the public at large. The general effect of the entire engagement was most gratifying. The large number of artists appearing in the various roles were of an unusually high standard of excellence. All the works were conducted by Chevalier Guiseppi Angelini entirely from memory. He displayed in every way a degree of decision and control not often heard. Indeed the splendid work of the orchestra and the ensemble in many of the chorus scenes were due to this unusual conductor.

" 'Rigoletto' brought us the fine voice and acting of Alessandro Modesti. He won great and deserved applause as Escamillo in 'Carmen.'

" 'Pagliacci' was one of the most finished of the performances given. It aroused a veritable furor of applause, due in a large measure to Ester Adaberto, whose beautiful singing of Nedda, and Guiseppi Agostini's splendid Canio, deserve the warmest possible praise. 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Barber of Seville' also were done brilliantly, and the engagement closed with a notable performance of 'Carmen.' This San Carlo Company is establishing a solid reputation throughout the country, and there is no doubt that it has become a permanent traveling feature of American operatic life. New York should hear this excellent body of singers and players."

AUDITORIUM ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATED.

The Century Opera Company celebrated the twenty-fifth year of the inauguration of the Auditorium Theatre in Chicago last Wednesday evening, December 9, with a presentation of "Romeo and Juliet." Twenty-five years ago the same opera was given with Patti as Juliet. The MUSICAL COURIER in its issue of December 18, 1889, reported the following:

The new Auditorium of Chicago was opened Monday evening of last week by Adelina Patti, who sang "Home, Sweet Home" to a distinguished audience, President Harrison among the rest. Frederic Grant Gleason's cantata, "Auditorium Festival Ode," was a great success, as was Clarence Eddy's organ playing of Dubois' new triumphal fantasie. Tuesday evening opera was given for the first time in the new structure. The work selected was Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." Wednesday evening, Tamagno, the tenor, scored a great triumph in "William Tell." Thursday evening Albani sang Marguerite to Ravelli's Faust and, considering her illness, won many honors. Friday evening Tamagno again won great applause with the Manrico in "Trovatore," Mrs. Valda singing Leonora. Saturday afternoon Patti appeared as Lucia and sang in good voice. Ravelli also created a favorable impression as Edgardo. The performances have been financially successful and great enthusiasm prevailed, although most of the critics are agreed that the diva's voice no longer possesses all the charm it once exercised.

THE DREAM OF ELGAR.

A modern version of the Arabian Nights entertainment known as Prince Barmecide's feast was enacted in New York last week. The difference between the old and new version is that the Arabian entertainer knew he was trifling with his guests and the New York conductor was sincerely in earnest and anxious to satisfy those who came to his feast of song.

Before making any comments on the work presented it is only right and just that the fullest measure of praise be given to Louis Koemmenich and the choristers of the Oratorio Society of New York. They did their work nobly. If a splendid performance could have redeemed a dreary work from the sin of monotony, the singing and interpretation given "The Dream of Gerontius" by the Oratorio Society would have done so. But no amount of fine interpretation, even by such a painstaking conductor as Louis Koemmenich and a chorus as skillful and devoted as that of the Oratorio Society of New York, can extract enough joy from "The Dream of Gerontius" to keep the general public from being bored.

Many of the works which most interest the hearer are not very grateful to the performer. But this work in question always seems to be of far more interest to the performer than to the hearer, as has been proved on several previous occasions.

Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" was chosen by the Oratorio Society of New York for the first concert of the season, which occurred on Wednesday evening, December 9, in Carnegie Hall. It is not difficult to understand why a work so full of vocal effects for soloists and choristers should get a hearing when it was first published; but it is surprising that so turgid and morbid an oratorio should be repeated. Its background of gloom relieved by penitence and wearied with lamentations, make it unwholesome for the emotionally weak and tedious in the extreme to the healthy minded. It is not to be wondered at that Dvorák refused to set this poem to music. No less a critic and a genius than Carlyle said that the brain of the author of this poem "was probably about the size of a moderate rabbit's." On the other hand, W. J. Dawson, in his "Makers of English Prose," asks, "Is there in our English literature any poem of similar aim so powerful and intense as 'The Dream of Gerontius'? Assuredly this is one of the great poems of the world, in spirit and substance akin to Goethe's 'Faust' and Dante's 'Trilogy,' in depth of spiritual insight and emotion superior to the former and the equal of the latter, and in purity of expression comparable with the finest work of the greatest poets."

It is evident, therefore, that there are admirers of Cardinal Newman's poem. Among them is Elgar, whose vein of religious mysticism is in accord with the spirit of the poem.

Shakespeare's Gratiano exclaims:

> Let my liver rather heat with wine
> Than my heart cool with mortifying groans.

Sir Edgar Elgar has chosen to set to music the mortifying groans. Whatever of hope, joy, exultation and glory there is in religion for many persons has been carefully avoided both by the poet and the composer of "The Dream of Gerontius." The spirit and emotional content of this music can well be described by an apt quotation from one of Cardinal Newman's sermons: "Hopes blighted, vows broken, lights quenched, warnings scorned, opportunities lost; the innocent betrayed, the young hardened, the penitent relapsing, the just overcome, the aged falling; the sophistry of misbelief, the wilfulness of passion, the obduracy of pride, the tyranny of habit, the canker of remorse, the wasting power of care, the anguish of shame, the pining of disappointment, the sickness of despair; such cruel, such pitiable spectacles, such heartrending, revolting, detestable, maddening scenes; nay, the haggard faces, the convulsed lips, the flushed cheek, the dark brow of the willing victims of rebellion."

Yet a booklet distributed with the program informed the audience that this compound of pessimism, gloom and despair is "the greatest English choral work." The author of the booklet naively continues: "For some reason, possibly because of an inadequate performance, the initial production in Birmingham aroused no intense popular interest." At the Birmingham Musical Festival in England it is not customary to give inadequate performances of choral works. When Mendelssohn's "Elijah" received its initial performance in exactly the same city there was no lack of intense popular interest "because of an inadequate performance."

And why was there a lack of intense popular interest in the performance of "The Dream of Gerontius" in Carnegie Hall last Wednesday evening? No excuse of inadequate performance can be urged.

Louis Koemmenich, that resourceful conductor, never had his choral forces better in hand. All the subtleties of the score were laid bare, and the most delicate as well as the most powerful shades of dynamic force and expression were splendidly realized. Gervase Elwes, a tenor with perfect enunciation, attractive personality and high musical intelligence, who has made a special study of this work, was brought over from England for this performance; Mildred Potter lent the charm of her rich, vibrating and sympathetic contralto voice to the performance, and Frank Croxton was called upon to sing the bass solos. And all for what? To emphasize the melodic barrenness and contrapuntal calculations of this greatest of Elgar's works, which is not "the greatest English choral work."

The continuous and complex prose of "The Dream of Gerontius" has not the value as a work of art of the measured poetry of Sullivan's "Golden Legend." Size is not grandeur, and artifice does not make art. No amount of praise from dilettante critics and amazed amateurs can give enduring life to a work which lacks the one essential quality, namely, an individual style. A little mazurka may be immortal because it has the inimitable stamp of Chopin's style. Another work is unmistakably Mendelssohn, or Wagner, or Grieg, or Debussy. It matters nothing at all whether the work is simple or complex, long or short, choral or instrumental; if it has not the stamp of originality upon it the jaws of oblivion will swallow it up. Who can mistake Bach? Who can recognize Elgar?

There is no denying the fact, however, that "The Dream of Gerontius" offers ample opportunity to the members of the chorus for all varieties of nuance and vocal effects. Composers of choral works cannot find better examples of good writing for voices than the best English choral works afford. It might easily be understood how each individual singer can find a satisfaction in the phrases set apart for him or her to sing. And it goes without saying that only a musician of experience and skill could disentangle such a complicated score and conduct the whole to such a triumphant victory of interpretation as Louis Koemmenich accomplished on this occasion.

But if these singers will take their places in the auditorium to listen to this conglomeration of polyphony for two hours or more they will soon discover the difference between the active and the passive—between defense and attack. Carnegie Hall, moreover, is so dully lighted in these parsimonious days that it is an eye strain to try to follow the printed text. Even that diversion is denied.

HOLIDAY OPERA.

To help pass the Yuletide tunefully, "Hänsel und Gretel" and ballet divertissements, with Rosina Galli, are announced as a special Christmas matinee at the Metropolitan Opera House, while "Parsifal" will be given on the afternoon of New Year's day.

CHOICE ENSEMBLE ART.

As perfect an example of string quartet ensemble as the musical world ever has known now is represented by the Flonzaley four, whose highest achievements were presented at their Aeolian Hall concert on Monday evening, December 7, in Beethoven's B major quartet, op. 18, No. 6, in a fashion to make the layman marvel and to give the musician one of those thoroughly satisfying tonal experiences which come only rarely in a whole lifetime of concert going and listening to the best in the art.

From the very beginning of their public activity the Flonzaley players were noted for the uncommon purity and fineness of their tone production and the extreme polish of their phrasing, and therefore much improvement in those respects hardly could be looked for where the results achieved already were so near to perfection. It is rather in the incisiveness, technical unity, spiritual cohesion and impressive musical authoritativeness of their readings that the Flonzaley has shown its amazing progress, and after the memorable Beethoven delivery of last week, the organization must unequivocally be stamped as the best string quartet ever heard in this country. Indeed, even the justly famous Joachim Quartet of other days failed to equal the younger organization in cleanness of intonation, technical finish and smoothness of general presentation.

To one who followed in the score the Flonzaley version of Beethoven, it was astounding to observe with what unerring accuracy every note, phrase, period, pause, accent, tempo suggestion and dynamic modulation was carried out exactly as indicated by the composer, and yet how fully the four artists understood the spirit of the music and with what sympathy and eloquence they voiced its deep appeal. Such quartet reading constitutes the summit of ensemble possibilities.

Sensitively conceived and carried out, the rendering of the Tschaikowsky quartet in E flat had also the necessary element of emotionalism which its exceedingly personal pages demand, and in consequence the number served as another artistic enjoyment of the evening. even though the Russian's music pleases rather than uplifts. The Tschaikowsky muse seems to have been really inspired only in the andante of this quartet, or perhaps it was made to seem so by the rare loveliness with which the Flonzaley strings sang their sweet song.

Two movements from a quartet by Darius Milhaud, a young French composer, showed that the influence of Debussy, Ravel and d'Indy has not been without its effect upon this newcomer. His work is based on the typical ultra-modern French scheme, which seeks to express its musical sensations through the medium of emancipated harmony and a series of "atmospheric" indications, rather than through the employment of direct melody euphoniously elaborated along the lines employed by the older composers. While Milhaud's themes and motifs are not in themselves of striking beauty, he utilizes them to form many episodes of decided piquancy and charm, and his contrapuntal background is of such skill and resource that in itself it forms a strong feature of interest.

The Flonzaley Quartet appearances in New York are too few. It seems as though a dozen of their concerts per season would not only be invaluable in the way of revealing to all of our musical public the true worth and beauty of the best in chamber music, but also should result in imposing profits. We presume, however, that the Flonzaley Quartet feels like Liszt, when he said to the rash lady who had asked him whether he made much money on his concert tours: "Madame, I endeavor to make music, not money."

Some musical soreheads seem to think that whenever Richard Strauss writes a new work he does it for the sole purpose of affronting them personally.

THE VOICE OF THE BOX OFFICE.

On this page is shown the official box office statement from the Chicago Auditorium when John McCormack gave his recital there on Sunday, December 6. The intake was $6,050.75, as proved by the sheet reproduced herewith. Two days before, in Toronto, McCormack drew $4,876, which is a phenomenal result considering that Canada is suffering directly from the effects of the war. The McCormack tour this season is a long series of similar financial records wherever the favored tenor appears.

PRO AND ALSO CON.

Can a thing be in two places at one time, and can a singer be in his best voice and his worst voice at the same instant? The answer is that while a thing cannot be in two places at one time a singer can be in his—but read for yourself:

GEORGE HAMLIN'S RECITAL, DECEMBER 9.

New York Press.
Mr. Hamlin was in unusually good voice yesterday.

New York Sun.
Mr. Hamlin was not in his best vocal condition.

American.
Mr. Hamlin's voice has beauty.

Tribune.
To many he may seem deficient in purely vocal charm; that is a physical matter over which he has no control.

Herald.
Perhaps there was a too frequent use of falsetto.

Sun.
He sang with his unfailing taste and intelligence.

ORATORIO SOCIETY CONCERT, DECEMBER 9.

Times.
Mr. Elwes had only arrived in New York from England yesterday morning, after a tempestuous passage, several days overdue. Under these circumstances his voice was naturally not at its best. It was somewhat lacking in resonance, and there were times when it seemed to be produced with a certain amount of effort.

Tribune.
Mr. Elwes stepped upon our shores yesterday, but no one would have suspected that fact from the superb manner in which he sang last night.

"BOHEME," DECEMBER 9.

American.
Mme. Alda was in unusually good voice.

World.
Her upper tones were unpleasantly shrill.

Of course one is prepared to note that critics do not agree on interpretations and musical conceptions, but one is just a bit surprised to read such divergence of opinions on the A B C subject of whether a singer is in good voice or not. When it comes to the matter of estimating compositions, the critics drift even further apart than they do in the gauging of vocal condition. For instance, at the Philharmonic concerts of last week, December 10 and 11, the program included Korngold's "Sinfonietta," and the Viennese boy composer was given these clear and useful hints by the erudite music critics of New York:

Sun.
The very disjointedness, redundancy and erratic developments in this work speak of the prodigality and wilfulness of youth.

Herald.
One striking point of the "Sinfonietta" is its clearly defined form. Little of the haphazard methods of composers striving merely for effect are to be noticed in his writing. His themes are joined smoothly and worked out logically.

Sun.
Only in the scherzo is a clear and logical development obtained.

World.
Less compact and consistent is the scherzo. . . .

Press.
Few, if any, evidences of individuality, of genuine melodic distinction, could be discovered.

Tribune.
He breaks naturally, spontaneously into melody.

OFFICIAL BOX OFFICE RECEIPTS OF JOHN McCORMACK AT THE AUDITORIUM THEATRE, CHICAGO.

Press.

The texture of the orchestra is too uniformly rich and ornate.

American.

One cannot in truth accuse Master Korngold of originality.

World.

In these two closing portions (third and fourth movements) the composer becomes disjointed, fragmentary.

Evening Post.

This last movement, with its amazingly complex, ever-changing, and conflicting rhythms, is extremely difficult.

Globe.

The orchestration of the piece is transparent and brilliant rather than solid and what is sometimes called rich.

Herald.

He has written interesting and original music.

American.

The fourth movement was pleasing and ingenious.

Times.

The score is conspicuously transparent and facile.

Many years ago Plutarch remarked that "to err in opinion, though it be not the part of wise men, is at least human." Are our music critics willing to admit that they err? Some of them err some of the time all the season, as our deadly parallels show whenever we have the leisure to draw these literal quotations from the daily papers. Would the music critics come under Byron's description, who said in "Beppo" (stanza 27):

> For most men (till by losing rendered sager)
> Will back their own opinions by a wager.

Come, now, gentlemen of the quill, would you be content to bet on your opinions?

Evelyn Starr with Mozart Club.

Evelyn Starr, the Canadian violinist, whose recent recital in Acolian Hall, New York, delighted the metropolitan critics and music lovers, has been engaged to take the place of Carl Flesch, the Hungarian violinist, with the Mozart Club of New York, March 6. This engagement indicates the opinion of music lovers as to the ability of Miss Starr when she is accepted in the place of the great Flesch.

Our Prize Contest.

The following notes are taken from a recent program booklet of one of the best known American symphony orchestras. The description is that of a familiar work. What is it? (The name of the solo instrument has been replaced by us with the words "solo instrument"):

"The work begins with vigorous swing, the theme sounding in the horns, the solo instrument presently striking a lusty trip of chords to the song of the strings. In a second verse the solo instrument holds the varied tune to the rhythm of the strings, and soon launches into a cadenza, followed by a canon between the solo instrument and strings. The flight of the song seems now to begin in earnest to the masterful coursing of harmonies in the solo instrument. And yet it is all mere prelude (in the tonic major of the movement) without a recurrence of the melody.

A lull of soft striking tones heralds the main theme, allegro con spirito, very opposite to the beginning in its incisive accent, developed with a grateful fulness of resources of the solo instrument.

"In intimate sequence flows the second theme, with a clear contrast of its tender mood and the expressive mettle of its song—the central lyric of the movement, with a large rôle, though there is a constant intermingling of a strain from the main theme. A passage for the solo instruments alone in tempo rubato begins with a rare dual song of the second melody.

"The theme of the andante semplice [in the relative major] is first sung by the flute over muted picking strings, then by the solo instrument over a gently flowing figure of the bowed strings.

"An almost frolicsome mood soon enters in the light wood and picking strings, with a play of running figures over which the melody sings in a chase of voices, with a brilliant course of the solo instrument. In sudden change of pace, allegro vivace assai strikes the middle episode where, on the pulse of sparkling strains sings a new melody molto cantabile e grazioso. A passage of the solo instrument leads back to the too brief song of the main tune.

"An almost martial temper shines in the sharp stress and clang of the theme, reiterated as in the chaconne or passacaglia. A change of figure comes in full tumultuous chorus and suddenly echoed softly with a lyric note of the solo instrument and leads to the tuneful second melody, in the major. There is a gamut of varying moods, as the first martial mood returns, or when it sings molto sostenuto, with a hint of the tender melody of the first movement.

"Again recurs the tumultuous chorus with the answering solo instrument, and the splendid flow of the second melody. Later on the coursing pulse of the strains of the solo instrument, it enters in faster pace, answered by the first theme.

"In growing volume, resting on the low pedal point of the dominant, begins a gathering madrigal of former figures, that leads to a mighty burst, in majestic pace, of the second melody, followed by the first in the major key."

Cereus Opera.

A correspondent writes: "Has it ever struck you that the Century or night-blooming opera company of New York (now playing in Chicago) is destined for another hundred years of sleep after its present blossoming ceases in several weeks or so? The only thing I can't make out is whether the Century opened its petals a hundred years too soon or too late. America used to have opera in English before I was born—and I am forty-four years old—but will it have opera in English in 2014? The matter is worrying me considerably. In fact, will there be opera at all in 2014? Do you know anything about it?"

Oh, yes, everything. There will be opera, and some new and some old works will be given. There will be two factions of auditors, one claiming that too many old works are given and the other asserting that too many new works are given. There will be a premier tenor whom the public will flock to hear. There will be a music critic who will say that "the prima donna's conception lacks breadth," and another who will say that the contralto's voice "was not in its best estate." Also there will be boys in the lobby selling "books o' the opry" and persons buying them in order to acquaint themselves with the story of "Faust," "Aida," "Traviata" and "Carmen." Finally, there will be an auditor who exclaims: "Admitting that the plot of 'The Magic Flute' is inane, must you not on the other hands concede that Mozart's music is—" but at that moment the ushers will drag him to a specially prepared lethal chamber, where he will die quickly, silently, ignominiously.

Where the Russian Passes.

A kind friend from abroad sends the photographs shown on the next page and says in comment: "A few weeks ago you protested fairmindedly against the constant exhibition in American newspapers of pictures of ruin wrought in Belgium by the Germans, and asked why no photographs were published illustrating the havoc created by the Russians in Galicia and East Prussia. Possibly the photographic display was so one-sided because no snapshots from Europe were permitted to pass to America except those approved by the Allies. I am sending you a couple of German pictures revealing the destruction which you wisely sensed as having taken place wherever the Russian passed through. Will you be liberal minded and courageous enough to put these views in your paper, even though you displease those fellow countrymen of yours who in this war, seem like the turbot, to have both eyes on one side of the head."

Hands Across the Sea.

In London, too, they have a Jury. Two members of it reported as follows recently:

"It was Mr. Will Crooks, the well known Labor member, who asked the chairman if the House might sing 'God Save the King,' and when Mr. Crooks started it in his deep bass voice, everyone stood up and joined in the singing."—Westminster Gazette.

"Moreover, Mr. Crooks had pitched the tune a little too high, and it seemed for a moment that he, with his rich tenor voice, would have to sing the anthem as a solo."—Daily Chronicle.

Serving One's Country.

Another journalistic curiosity from England is the manner in which a Mr. Percy Harrison advertises the soloists at his course of concerts. These examples are from a Newcastle paper:

ARTHUR DE GREEF.

"The distinguished Belgian pianist, whose only connection with Germany is that the brutal German soldiers have burned down to the ground his home in the beautiful city of Louvain, and so utterly ruined him that he is now a Refugee in London."

MARK HAMBOURG,

"The well-known Russian pianist (born at Bogutchar, in South Russia), who has been a naturalized Englishman since 1896, and who some time since married a Scotch lady of high social position and great personal attraction."

More Patriotism.

The same Mr. Harrison informs his patrons also that he has cancelled the engagement of Elena Gerhardt and Arthur Nikisch "in deference to the strongly expressed wishes of many of his oldest and most esteemed subscribers."

Muse in Khaki.

Add to much other unspeakably bad poetry which the war has brought forth, the following, William Watson's latest, entitled "A Hero's Exit," and published in the London Saturday Review:

A son of England, bred betwixt the Dee
And Mersey, wounded unto death was lying;
Near him an officer of the enemy
Lay also stricken and dying:
Who, seeing the Englishman with thirst half crazed,
Toward his own full flask made kindly gesture;
But to his own lips 'twas in error raised,
Ere he doffed mortal vesture.

"Nein, nein," he murmured, waving it away,
And bade them minister to his English foeman,

And so passed into silence. On that day
A nobler death died no man.

And English soldiers dug his alien grave,
And with scant ritual, and no needless cerements,
Tenderly was the tender and the brave

His name our warriors knew not. But I think
That in some book to German and to Briton
Sealed until Doomsday, with no fading ink,
'Tis luminously written.

Thanks, Bert.

Bert Leston Taylor, in Chicago Tribune:

"Perhaps there would be more sympathy for musical critics if they could agree on the mere facts of a performance. The MUSICAL COURIER presents a few recent examples of critical discord:

Evening World.

"Geraldine Farrar made her first entrance, climbing the hill, from behind the scenes, singing on the key, a rare thing for her to do.

Herald.

"Miss Farrar has seldom sung the music better, barring the trying entrance aria, which seemed to cause her some difficulty.

Press.

"The popular American soprano was not in good voice, her high tones, in particular, sounding peculiarly harsh and grating.

Herald.

"Miss Farrar has seldom sung the music better.

Sun.

"When she did essay to push her tones a little they were not good."

Tribune.

"Last night she was in excellent voice and sang discreetly."

Plaudits and Pelf.

"What a wonderful feeling it must be to be able to arouse one's fellow beings to such outbursts of joy," said a listener at the Kreisler concert last Saturday. And what a wonderful feeling it must be for Kreisler to peruse the box office statement after his joyful fellow beings have left the hall. Or does he see it sooner? Just before he plays Bach's chaconne, for instance?

Denial of Atrocity.

No, Ethelinda, we did not call the tenor's voice "appalling"; we distinctly wrote "appealing."

Checking the Goose Step.

So far we have heard eleven different English pronunciations of the title of Weber's opera which is to be revived here next Saturday. The proper pronunciation of the name—note carefully—is "Euryanthe."

Wet Powder.

From Puck: "Puzzled Reader—You are quite correct in your surmise. 'Der Rosenkavalier,' put on at the Metropolitan, is a musical version of Roosevelt's Rough Riders." Oh, oh, Puck, and that from you, the paper of bright ideas, original wit, and artistic appreciation.

Musical Christmas Trick.

Take a five dollar gold piece, let it drop on a marble topped table or a stone flagging, and you will notice a very pleasing ring. Put the ring on your finger and send us the five dollar gold piece for a year's subscription to the MUSICAL COURIER. LEONARD LIEBLING.

Shattuck's Sketching Talent.

Arthur Shattuck, the American pianist, who arrives on the steamship Baltic the latter part of this week, has frequently been mentioned in the MUSICAL COURIER with reference to his cleverness not only at the piano, but also with the pencil. Numerous magazines have requested Mr. Shattuck to produce humorous drawings, but the pianist only turns to the pencil when the spirit moves him. At odd times when listening to a concert he may caricature the artist, as is instanced in the accompanying drawing.

The true American sense of humor which pervades the Shattuck personality crops out in the product of his pencil, as many of his artist friends attest—having received a Shattuck cartoon by post or messenger.

An American Guild Service.

Easily one of the most interesting services ever held by the American Guild of Organists in Philadelphia was given under the direction of S. Wesley Sears, in the Church of the Advocate, Eighteenth and Diamond streets, recently. Mr. Sears, who is sub-dean of the Pennsylvania chapter, was assisted by George Alexander A. West, who played the entire series. The boy choir of 150 voices was picked from the organizations of Mr. Sears, Henry S. Fry, F. Avery Jones, A. Gordon Mitchell, Harry C. Banks, Jr., Harold S. M. Balsley, and Lewis A. Wadlow. The organ offertory was the adagio from Mark Andrews first sonata. The boy choir gave an excellent a capella rendition of "God So Loved the World," from Stainer's "Crucifixion." The next public service of the local chapter will be held in St. Clement's Church, Philadelphia, on the evening of February 2.

Sousa in Boston.

Relative to the concert given recently in Boston by Sousa and his band, the following appeared in the Boston Journal of December 7:

"The Sousa concert at Symphony Hall brought $3,500 to the Wellesley restoration fund, according to the announcement of the Wellesley College Club, under the auspices of which the concert was given."

In the Boston Evening Record this statement was made:

"A final appeal to complete the $2,000,000 building fund necessary by January 1 has been sent out to all friends and alumnae of Wellesley College.

"The Sousa concert given recently at Symphony Hall under the auspices of the Boston Wellesley College Club netted the club $3,500."

Nachez in Canada.

M. Tivador Nachéz, violinist and composer, gave his first concert in America at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa on Tuesday evening, December 8. The concert was given under the distinguished patronage of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught for the benefit of the Queen's Canadian Military Hospital and the Belgian Relief Fund. Mr. Nachéz had four appearances on the program playing the first movement of the Mendelssohn concerto, three seventeenth century pieces, two original numbers written by himself and Kreisler's "Liebesfreud," and two numbers by Dr. Charles Harriss, "Meditation" and "Valse Capricieuse."

Frances Ingram in St. Louis.

With the Apollo Club in St. Louis, Frances Ingram, contralto, appeared November 24.

The Daily Globe-Democrat of November 25 referred to her singing as follows:

"Frances Ingram's rich voice was heard to advantage in the ever pleasing aria from Father Gluck's pseudo opera, 'Orpheus.' . . . Few classic arias are better known, few so well adapted to genuine contralto intonation. Ingram captured the house with this number, and after that her group of songs, including MacDowell's ever popular 'A Maid Sings Light,' gained this fine singer much deserved applause."

Malkin's Success in Boston.

Joseph Malkin, cellist, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played at last week's concerts of that organization in Boston, December 11 and 12, and his success is registered in the following telegram to his brother, Manfred Malkin, of New York: "Malkin created great sensation with public and press playing Haydn concerto."

Joseph Malkin is instructor of the violoncello at the Malkin Music School, 26 Mt. Morris Park, West, New York City.

Foerster Songs Given.

"After the Revel" and "Nights of Music," songs by the Pittsburgh composer, Adolph M. Foerster, were sung by Helena Baschcopf, the composer at the piano, at the Ringwalt Choral Union concert, Conservatory of Music Hall, Pittsburgh, Pa., December 10.

GRAND OPERA IN NEW YORK.

"Carmen" Attracts Another Vast Audience—"Walküre" Splendidly Performed—Sunday Night Opera Concert.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

"Carmen," December 7.

The third "Carmen" performance of the season on Monday evening of last week served to emphasize the wisdom of Giulio Gatti-Casazza's revival of Bizet's masterpiece, for the Metropolitan Opera House again was filled with an immense audience that taxed even the standee space. The unlabored melodies of the opera once more were effectively uttered by singers, orchestra and chorus under Arturo Toscanini.

Geraldine Farrar in the title role sang intelligently and acted with artistic abandon. Enrico Caruso's Don Jose had both vocal and histrionic attractiveness, and the great tenor roused the audience to outbursts of joyous approval on numerous occasions during the performance. The golden tones of Caruso sounded in all their ravishing beauty in the big second act aria and also in the scenes with Micaela. Lucrezia Bori, in fine vocal fettle, was a charming Micaela, bringing to the part the requisite simplicity and modesty. In the first act duet with Don Jose and in her aria of the third act, the Bori vocalism was of limpid purity and sweetness. The listening assemblage rewarded the prima donna with unstinted plaudits.

Pasquale Amato gave a rousing performance of Escamillo, delivering the "Toreador Song" with vigor and tremendous dramatic appeal. He was in excellent voice.

Mabel Garrison as Frasquita sang tastefully and agreeably. Sophie Braslau was the Mercedes; Albert Reiss and Angelo Bada were the smugglers, Doncaire and Remendado; Leon Rothier was an impressive Luniga, and Désiré Defrère filled the minor role of Morales.

The ensemble was all that one could wish for, the stage settings were magnificent, and, altogether considered, "Carmen" is one of the very best accomplishments to be placed to the credit of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

"Boheme," December 9.

Puccini's conglomeration of treacly tunes and nougat orchestration suits very well the supersentimentalized perversion of Murger's famous book which the "Boheme" libretto represents. Noddings of the head when Musetta sings her cheap waltz song and sniffles of the nose when Mimi expires pathetically in the last act, indicate the two forms of enjoyment that a naïve audience obtains at this Puccini opera, which has neither psychology nor musical science enough to repulse the crowd.

Mme. Alda was a most convincing Mimi, giving the role many subtle touches of delicacy and charm, and singing it with rare taste in phrasing, and wide resource in sounding the accents of romance, tenderness and pathos. Her voice sounded beautifully clear, full and well modulated. Luca Botta did excellent work as Rodolfo, acting spiritedly and singing in refined and effective manner. Elisabeth Schumann, as Musetta, that much overrated role, gave it the required vivacity in delivery and agility in movement. Messrs. Scotti, Tegani, De Segurola, etc., completed the cast. Giorgio Polacco, at the conductor's desk, saw to it that the orchestral contributions were models of accuracy and charm, and that the chorus and principals maintained a fine ensemble.

"The Magic Flute," December 10.

A newcomer as Tamino, Johannes Sembach added interest to the Thursday performance, especially as he sang the Mozart measures with smooth tone production, splendid breath control, and intimate knowledge of the style and interpretative nuances required. In his histrionic impersonation, Sembach displayed grace and as much dignity as it is possible to put into such a spineless role.

Frieda Hempel, who is in exquisite artistic form this season, gave unalloyed delight with her blithe cadenza carollings as Astrafiammente. Her coloratura has taken on accuracy and brilliancy even though it seemed practically perfect on former occasions.

Carl Braun was a resonant and artistically impressive Sarastro, who reveals finical regard for varying the color of his deep toned voice as much as possible, an example which certain other expounders of sub-cellar vocalism might well follow with profit. Emmy Destinn gave her usual excellent Pamina version, Elisabeth Schumann repeated her animated Papagena and Albert Reiss his humorous Monostatos. Others in the cast were Vera Curtis, Rita Fornia, Lila Robeson, Anna Case, Louise Cox, Marie Mattfeld, Carl Schlegel, Max Bloch, Julius Bayer, and Otto Goritz.

"Walkure," December 11.

Most popular of all the Wagner operas are "Lohengrin" and "Tannhäuser," but "Walküre" is beginning to crowd them closely for leading honors, and it is more than likely that eventually the earlier works will give precedence to the second of the "Ring" music dramas as a medium for general appeal and for insuring a corresponding response at the box office. The "Walküre" is more frankly and directly lyrical than the rest of the "Ring" and that is why it has grown closer to the public's heart than its fellows in the cycle.

As Mme. Gadski is essentially a lyrical Wagner singer and prefers bel canto delivery to the merely declamatory style, she is an ideal Sieglinde, and last Friday she informed the part with beautiful vocalism and inexpressible histrionic charm. The fact that customarily Mme. Gadski sings the Brünnhilde in "Walkure" but added to the interest and value of her Sieglinde interpretation.

Margarete Matzenauer, the Brünnhilde of this occasion, has been heard previously in the role and repeated the good impression made then. Mme. Matzenauer always is artistically intelligent and dramatically forceful and she proved that she understands fully the complex character of Wagner's Amazonian heroine, sometimes goddess, sometimes woman, and always eminently lovable.

Mme. Ober, as Fricka, did her part well. Jacques Urlus was a picturesque and vocally sympathetic Siegmund who dictioned capably and acted sincerely.

Carl Braun, the Wotan, realized strikingly the large possibilities of the role and did some of the best work that has been accomplished by him here. He rose to really impressive heights in the "Farewell," and at all times sang sonorously without forcing his voice or upsetting the tonal proportions of the score.

Basil Ruysdael, that versatile and reliable artist, gave a gripping portrayal of the Hunding figure, grim, unbending, implacable. The performer's powerful voice and his giant figure added materially to the intensity of the presentment.

The very eloquent "Walküre" octet consisted of Lenora Sparkes, Elisabeth Schumann, Vera Curtis, Rita Fornia,

"Madame Butterfly," December 12 (Matinee.)

There have been much larger audiences at the Metropolitan than the one which heard "Madame Butterfly" on Saturday afternoon. Even the popular Cio Cio San, Geraldine Farrar, and the popular baton wielder, Toscanini, did not pack the house to undue proportions. Martinelli deepened the good impression made by him previously as Pinkerton. Rita Fornia's sympathetic Suzuki interpretation again was a feature. To complete the cast there were Scotti, Helen Mapleson and William Small, Jr. The last named did the baby role.

"Aida," December 12 (Evening).

Saturday evening's performance was for the benefit of the Italian Benevolent Institute, and as the MUSICAL COURIER does not review charity affairs it is only necessary to state that Giorgio Polacco conducted, and Caruso, Amato, Destinn, Ober, Sparkes, Rossi, and Didur sang. Rosina Galli danced. Many distinguished Italians were in the boxes and stalls.

Metropolitan Sunday Concert,

At the Sunday night concert in our operatic temple, a cellist, Pablo Casals, was the "guest" soloist and played the Saint-Saëns concerto and Bruch's "Kol Nidrei." Mr. Casals appeared in this country some years ago and made a good impression, which he repeated last Sunday evening.

Lucrezia Bori sang a "Carmen" aria and some Spanish songs by Serrano, Iradier, and Freixas (a folk tune harmonized by him) and pleased her hearers mightily with her silvery timbred voice, her ingratiating method of delivery, and her very artistic phrasing.

Luca Botta, the new Metropolitan tenor, wins more friends with each new appearance. He has a manly, straightforward style without affectation, a very agreeable and well schooled vocal organ and sympathetic musical and dramatic insight—qualities which were revealed to the full in a "L'Africaine" aria, and in songs by di Gambardella and E. De Curtis. Andrea de Segurola did subtly nuanced Spanish folk songs harmonized by Manen and an original number by Valverde. The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capricio Español," and a Moszkowski Spanish dance.

Florence Hardeman Plays.

Florence Hardeman's success at her recent Cincinnati recital, which was attended by one of the most fashionable audiences ever assembled at a concert in that city, was as pronounced with the press as it was with the public. The Commercial Tribune calls Miss Hardeman "a talent of exceptional order," and speaks of her "masterful control of the technic of the violin," and how easily she surmounted the difficulties. "Lyric expression" and "breadth of conception" also were found by the Tribune in Miss Hardeman's performance. "Extremely brilliant and exceedingly skillful" is the Times Star's description of the player's technic, while her style "carries all before it." She also is "a vivid expressionist who holds attention." Her firm fingers and fine bow arm receive warm tribute. In the Enquirer it is stated that the young artist "has true violinistic gifts. She has the verve and spirit of a genuine virtuoso, together with a splendid technical mastery and a fine musicianly feeling. Her tone is large and vibrant, her playing healthy and fervent, and her personality of an engaging type." Mention is made, too, of Miss Hardeman's "great beauty and richness of tone," "temperament of remarkable order," and "technical facility of brilliance," "dash."

All the papers are unanimous in reporting the pronounced success, the many encores and in prophesying a sure future of importance. The concert giver played Vitali's chaconne, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagñole," Gluck's Harrison Keller's "Poeme Elegiaque," A. W. Kramer's "Chant Negre," Kreisler's "Tambourine Chinois" and Ernst's "Hungarian Airs."

Wanted.

Madeline, a sequestered little village in Lassen County, is trying hard to locate a pretty school ma'am who can play the piano as well as instruct in the three "R's."

J. H. Fulston, of Madeline postoffice, Lassen County, has made his plea to State Superintendent of Public Instruction Edward Hyatt, asking him to secure a school teacher for the Ash Valley region as follows:

"State Superintendent of Schools, Sacramento:

"DEAR SIR—Parties having children attending school in Ash Valley are desirous of obtaining a teacher this coming term who can also give instruction on the piano. It is an eight months' school and the salary $70 per month. If you would kindly bring this information to some one qualified it would be much appreciated. Application should be addressed to J. H. Fulston, Madeline P. O., Cal.

"Respectfully, R. MADSEN."

Borwick and Philadelphia Orchestra.

Philadelphia, Pa., December 12, 1914.

A pronounced leaning toward the strictly classical is the outstanding attribute of the interpretative genius of Leonard Borwick, the English pianist, who was heard for the first time in Philadelphia at the regular concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy of Music last Friday afternoon and evening. A keen sense of form, of accent and perspective, seem his dominant qualities; and that he chooses to stand for judgment squarely upon this phase of his art is to be inferred from the fact that at his Philadelphia concert his only offering was the Beethoven concerto in C minor. The intricate phraseology of this work was spun out with a facile technic that at times was Chopinesque in its delicacy. While the interpretation ranked with the composition as a piece of "head work," there was little of that quicker pulse beat which made Beethoven a borderline composer—in his own day "the newest of the old and the oldest of the new." Mr. Borwick is not of the passionists. He is rather of the [illegible] mic cloister.

The beautiful Brahms symphony, No. 4, in E minor, was effectively played by Leopold Stokowski and his men. The "Magic Flute" and "Oberon" overtures completed the program.

Spiering Plays in St. Louis.

Theodore Spiering's appearances with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra last Friday and Saturday, December 11 and 12 (he played the Bruch concerto in G minor) were unusually successful. The Globe Democrat, Republic, Times, Post Dispatch and Westliche Post devote much space in enthusiastic tribute to Mr. Spiering's kindling and finished art.

"Fidelio" and "Orfeo" were the latest opera offerings in Stuttgart.

NEWARK HAS RECORD MUSICAL WEEK.

Large Number of Concerts Keep Newark Music Lovers Especially Busy.

Newark, N. J., December 14, 1914.

This week just passed has been the busiest musically so far this season. Event after event has taken place, and there has not been a single evening in the two weeks just gone by without a musical affair of some kind recorded. Last season was a dull one compared to this, and there was never the eagerness to attend concerts that seems to exist this year. The number of music lovers in Newark has increased in bounds, and it is to be hoped that the present enthusiasm will continue throughout the year.

Arion Concert.

In Krueger Auditorium last Monday evening the Arion Singing Society, temporarily under Arthur Mees' direction owing to the absence of Richard Trunk in Germany, gave an excellent concert before a large audience. The work of the chorus was splendid, the voices blending well together.

As soloists two local artists contributed to the program—Katherine Eyman, the young pianist, and Paul Petri, baritone. Miss Eyman played the Grieg piano concerto in A minor displaying excellent technic and delightful expression. Her interpretation was delightful and she played with great brilliancy. Her teacher, Alexander Lambert, of New York, was among those present. Paul Petri sang Siegmund's "Love Song," from "Die Walküre," three Schubert songs, "Salamis."

Orpheus Club Concert.

The twenty-sixth season of the Orpheus Club opened last Thursday evening, when a splendid concert was given at Wallace Hall before a large and representative audience. Anita Rio, former soprano-soloist of Trinity Church, this city, made her first appearance here since her departure for Europe several years ago. She sang the "Air of Lia," from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son"; Hues' "A des Oiseaux," "Marichiare," arranged by Tosti; "Torne a Sorrento," arranged by De Curtis, and two pretty English songs, "Have You Seen But a White Lillie Grow?" and "Shepherd, Thy Demeanor Vary." As encores she added Cadman's "Land of the Sky-Blue Water" and Taubert's "In Exile." All of her numbers were unusually delightful and enthusiastically received. Mme. Rio has a voice of delightful quality and her interpretation was equally excellent.

The choral selections were all fine, the members showing the results of hard work in their well rendered numbers. A feature of the evening was the singing of Daniel E. Hervey's "Falstaff's Song," which was splendid; Mr. Hervey is the music critic of the Sunday Call.

Second Artist Concert.

Friday evening marked the second concert of the eighth series of artists' concerts in the Eliot Street School, given under the direction of Charles Grant Shaffer. The program was a praiseworthy one and the large audience showed its thorough appreciation in loud applause. The work of the Russian Symphony String Quartet was loudly applauded. Florence Mulholland, contralto, was the soloist, and pleased her hearers with a number of well chosen songs.

Newark Musicians Club Concert.

The third concert this season of the Newark Musicians Club was held last Wednesday evening, when in spite of the numerous other affairs taking place at the same time a good size audience composed of members and their friends listened to the following well rendered program: Concerto for two violins (Bach), Ethel Cecilia Smith and Edwin Wickenhoefer; violin solo, "Witches Dance" (Paganini), Jacob Rittenband; contralto solos, "Angus MacDonald" (Roeckel), and "A Perfect Day" (Jacobs-Bond), Agnes Wharton; piano solos, "Eccossaisen" (Beethoven), "Wiegenlied" (Joseffy) and gavotte (Bensch), Alexander Berne. Arthur Klein and Frank Mindnich were the accompanists. The work of each member was deserving of the highest praise.

South Park Church Concert.

Last Friday evening, in the large lecture room of the South Park Presbyterian Church, a musicale of unusual interest was given. The program was a well arranged one and elicited spontaneous applause. The room was crowded, between two and three hundred persons being present. All of the soloists with the exception of Miss Drake are members of the Newark Musicians Club and are counted among the best of the younger artists of the city.

Ethel Cecilia Smith opened the program with a violin solo—movement No. 4 (Symphonie Espagnole), by Lalo which she played with great effect, her technic and tone quality being features of her playing; later Miss Smith added three more delightful numbers, "En Bateau" (Debussy), "Sonatine" (Paganini), and "Liebesfreud" (Kreisler). Catherine Bryce, soprano, contributed five songs, each one of which was brilliantly sung; Miss Bryce has a voice of wide range and of excellent quality. She sang "A Spray of Roses" (Sanderson), "Yesterday and Today" (Spross), and three songs by Ralph Cox with the composer at the piano, "Somebody Loves Me," "Forget," "O, Love, Good Night."

The contralto soloist was Mary Potter, who has won many admirers with the beautiful qualities of her voice. Big, round, full tones are hers and she made excellent use of them; her numbers were "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice" (from "Samson and Delilah"), "An Open Secret" (Woodman), and "Wohin" (Lassen).

Mildred Steele Allen, who arranged the concert, was the accompanist and piano soloist; Miss Allen, a pupil of Joseffy, displayed a well developed technic and manifested unusual interpretative ability. Her two numbers were "Arabesque" (Leschetizky) and "Waltzer A" (Moskowski).

Music Notes.

Miriam Arndt-Ardini gave a delightful song recital in Wallace Hall on Tuesday evening before a large audience.

A well attended concert was given on Thursday evening last in the Olivet Presbyterian Church. The soloists were Mildred Serbe, pianist; Francesco Rubini, baritone; Luigi Spada, violinist; Luigi Mazzel, harpist, Mrs. L. Carroll Beckel, soprano.

The Newark Music Festival Chorus held its weekly rehearsal in the Central High School last Wednesday evening. Four other affairs of a musical nature took place this same evening and the inclement weather was an additional handicap, yet nevertheless a large audience was present and thirty-odd new singers applied for membership that evening. The next rehearsal, Wednesday evening, is to be an unusual one, for not only is a full attendance expected, but a large number of the Jersey City chorus members are to attend.

The Jersey City Festival Chorus is growing in rapid strides. Nearly a hundred new members were added following the first rehearsal, and as soon as the holidays are over a large attendance is expected. The next rehearsal of the Jersey City singers will be held on Thursday evening in the Lincoln High School.

Last Friday evening, at Wintringham Hall, Jersey City, C. Mortimer Wiske, the director of the Newark Festival, and Thornton W. Allen, the organizer, addressed the members of the Musicians' Society of Jersey City, at their first public concert and reception. A detailed account of this event is published on this same page in the Jersey City letter.

Last Wednesday evening Nahan Franko's Orchestra furnished the music for the huge pageant and ball given at the First Regiment Armory under the auspices of the New Jersey Vacation Sub-Committee and the Guild of the Babies' Hospital. There were nearly four thousand persons present and the affair proved so successful that it is planned to repeat it in 1915. The pageant was a gigantic undertaking but was excellently presented. Voss' Military Band assisted in the music. To Alice Kirkpatrick is due most of the credit for the success of the enormous enterprise.

Music and Wars in London.

[From London Truth, November 4, 1914.]

Not a little surprise and indignation has been caused in the musical and theatrical professions by the exclusion of their members from the benefits of the National Relief Fund. Few classes of the community are suffering more acutely, but the decision has gone forth, it would seem, that they are not eligible to receive any sort of assistance from the great central fund. Yet who are more promptly appealed to or more ready to come forward in normal times when the needs of o hers are in question? At the present time, indeed, concerts and other performances are being organized all over the country on behalf of the very charity from which those thus giving their services are ruthlessly excluded. . . .

What is the truth about Dr. Richter and his British degrees? The hope was expressed here the other day that he might be found to have been maligned in the matter, but authoritative information on the subject is still to seek, apparently. According to one statement the worthy Doctor was confronted with the alternative of discarding his English honors or forfeiting his pension, and if this really were the case, I suppose we can hardly be surprised if he chose the less heroic course. . . .

The abandonment of the Three Choirs Festival this year was doubtless inevitable, though the decision has been criticised in some quarters. With so many demands on the public at the present time in connection with the recruiting, the innumerable war charities, and so forth, to say nothing of the gaps in the male ranks of the choir, the authorities probably had little choice in the matter. But the loss to the charities which ordinarily benefit from the proceeds of the festival will necessarily be serious. The public is being invited accordingly to make good the deficieney, and it is to be hoped that all supporters of the festivals will make a point of contributing to it.

JERSEY CITY CLUB HOLDS RECEPTION.

An Excellent Musical Program and Delightful Reception Mark the Initial Public Meeting of the Musicians' Society of Jersey City.

Jersey City, N. J., December 12, 1914.

Jersey City music lovers were treated to a delightful evening of music, followed by a reception in Wintringham Hall, last night. It was the opening public concert and reception of the Musicians' Society of Jersey City, which is a new organization, but which is growing rapidly. Every seat in the hall was occupied excepting a few in the front, and the audienee was a very enthusiastic one.

James P. Dunn, the president, presided and opened the program with a short address of welcome. Rev. George D. Hadley followed Mr. Dunn with words of praise for the work the society is accomplishing.

Jane Hanks contributed the first musical number, two songs for soprano, "Widmung" (Schumann) and "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" (Townsend). Miss Hanks has a voice of excellent quality and possesses a great deal of temperament.

On the subject of "The Musicians' Clubs and Their Work," Thornton W. Allen, of Newark, then spoke, telling of the advantages of such clubs and the plan now on foot to organize similar clubs in the various cities of New Jersey for the purpose of carrying out much larger and more important ideas than have ever been attempted so far. Mr. Allen, whose ideas brought about the organization of the Musicians' Society of Jersey City, is the organizer of the Newark Musicians' Club as well as the Newark Music Festival, which is to be given next May, and for which he has been the means of organizing a chorus of nearly three hundred Jersey City singers. It is his idea to hold a Tri-City Music Festival, in which Paterson, Newark and Jersey City are to coöperate, and which will have a combined chorus of about three thousand voices, an orchestra of one hundred members and world renowned soloists; three concerts will be given in each city. In order to carry out this scheme, he said, it is necessary to group together the musicians of each city in the form of a club. Now that the Jersey City society has been established and the Newark club has been permanently organized, he is formulating plans for the starting of a similar society in Paterson. One of the important measures to be taken up after the clubs have all been established is the subject of a New Jersey State Music Teachers' Association.

A sonata in F major (Beethoven) for piano and violin then followed. Stephen Coutant, the violinist, gave this number an able interpretation. Like the other soloists he was obliged to add an encore.

The next speaker on the program was C. Mortimer Wiske, who is conducting the Jersey City Festival chorus in preparation for the Newark concerts. Mr. Wiske, who was formerly assistant conductor with Theodore Thomas and was an important factor in the establishment of the Cincinnati festival, and who is now entering upon his fourteenth year as director of the Paterson, N. J., annual music festival, and his first season as conductor of the Newark Music Festival, was selected to speak on the subject of "The Music Festival." In brief he outlined the advantages of a music festival from a commercial as well as an educational standpoint, referring to the early English, and the Worcester and Cincinnati festivals. Too, he told of the plans to establish a tri-city festival and what it would mean for each of the cities involved. The Jersey City Festival chorus which he is directing was also referred to. His speech was a most interesting one.

A young girl pianist, pretty and attractive, and full of temperament, was the next soloist and her rendition of Grieg's "Ballade in G minor" was quite astonishing. She played well, displayed great strength, tone color, and interpretation. She was recalled and added an encore.

George Evitt, tenor, then contributed two numbers, "For You Alone" (Geehl) and "A Sailor's Love Song" (Scott), both of which were well received; he, too, added an encore.

Following the program an informal reception was held and refreshments were supplied by the Entertainment Committee. That the affair was a great success can not be denied and to Mr. Dunn is due a great deal of credit for the arrangement of this splendid program.

REGINA DE SALES' LIST OF PROMINENT PUPILS.

Parisian Vocal Teacher Now Has Studio in New York.

Nothing could speak more eloquently for a teacher's ability than the success of his or her pupils, and in this regard Regina de Sales, the Parisian vocal teacher, who now has a studio in New York, has been unusually fortunate. The appended list of her pupils shows a very large number now appearing successfully in European opera houses, on the concert stage of Europe and America, or actively engaged in teaching. The list also contains many names of those who have studied for their own pleasure and who have since become prominent as musical amateurs and supporters of musical endeavor.

Strube Composition Played.

At the manuscript concert given recently by the Florestan Club, of Baltimore, Md., one of the successes of the evening was the prelude and dance (new) written by Gustav Strube, the conductor-composer. The performers were: First violin, Gustav Strube, the composer; second violin, Abram Goldfuss; violist, Israel Dorman; cellist, Alfred Furthmaier; pianist, George F. Boyle.

The prelude and dance is part of an opera that Mr. Strube is at present writing and was especially arranged by him for strings and piano for the Manuscript concert.

The members of the club showed much enthusiasm over the work and the composer received an ovation. Mr. Strube is an important factor in the music life of Baltimore.

PATERSON ORPHEUS CLUB'S SUCCESS.

Historic Male Chorus Gives First Concert of Season—Work of Conductor C. Mortimer Wiske Praised—Marie Kaiser the Soloist.

Paterson, N. J., December 7, 1914.

Last night's concert was a real triumph for the Orpheus Club of Paterson, which, reorganized with a membership of one hundred, gave the best concert in its history. The weather was very inclement, but even this did not keep the enthusiastic audience away. Over eight hundred persons assembled in the big auditorium of the High School and applauded vigorously each number.

The soloists announced for the evening were Marie Kaiser, soprano, and Albin Antosch, violoncellist. It is to be regretted that, for some unknown reason, Mr. Antosch failed to appear, Miss Kaiser filling the vacancy. Notwithstanding Mr. Antosch's absence, the audience appeared just as well pleased and succeeded numerous times in bringing Miss Kaiser back to the stage for encores.

The increasing of the club membership to one hundred added tremendous additional volume to the chorus and made the singing more notable in many ways. Compared with the previous membership of forty or fifty, many differences were observed, the present orgnization surpassing all previous records in tone production as well as in phrasing.

C. Mortimer Wiske proved an able director and he conducted the singers with his usual masterly skill. His work was thoroughly appreciated. At the close of the program Mr. Wiske expressed himself as pleased with the work of the new organization and hoped for still greater successes in the future.

Miss Kaiser has a soprano voice of wide range and of beautiful quality. Her first song was Debussy's "L'enfant Prodigue," which proved a splendid opening number. Following this she sang as an encore Woodman's "Birthday."

Substituting for Mr. Antosch, Miss Kaiser then sang a delightful group of songs, which included "Laddie," "Roses," "Spring Is Coming," and "The Flower and the Maid." Later she sang Kellie's "I Had a Flower," Nevin's "At Twilight," and Russell's "Sacred Fire," with "Comin' Through the Rye" as an encore.

The choral numbers were "Song of the Vikings," by Chadwick; Lovet's "The Low Back'd Car," Jacobsen's "Keep a-Goin'," Pilgrim's Chorus from "Tannhäuser," Riker's "Dearie," and Bullard's "The Kavanagh." In all of these numbers the chorus was well balanced and sang with precision. The tone quality was great. It was in the familiar "Tannhäuser" chorus that the club did its finest work. The "Song of the Vikings" was also an excellent number and merited loud applause.

The concert was a tremendous success from every point of view. The work of the chorus surpassed that of all previous years, the solo numbers of Miss Kaiser proved a delightful treat, and the audience itself, a good sized one, left pleased and satisfied. Mr. Wiske deserves great credit for the work he and the Orpheus Club has accomplished.

The accompaniments of William Hammond, the club pianist, were thoroughly appreciated. T. W. A.

Witek Recital, at von Ende School of Music.

A large audience filled the von Ende School of Music, New York, to its utmost capacity, December 5, when Anton and Vita Witek gave a recital, assisted by Heinrich Warnke, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The arrangement of the program skillfully led to a powerful climax. It began with the concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102, by Brahms, which, although not one of the composer's most spontaneous creations, is an unusual work. The two instruments are so admirably balanced in the thematic work allotted to each that they really become only the tools through which the composer realizes his intentions. But splendid tools they were, the violin of Mr. Witek and the violoncello of Mr. Warnke; they interpreted the composition in such an admirable manner that none of its beauties escaped the listener. The andante was particularly charming.

The second number was Schumann's G minor sonata, op. 22, for piano, played by Mme. Witek, a rare personality among the pianists now before the public. She so discreetly subordinates herself in the ensemble numbers, that her appearance as a soloist has always something of a surprise. A more thoughtful and brilliant interpretation of the sonata has not been heard in New York for a long time. The thematic structure became transparent under her fingers; the crispness of her passage work was never more striking, and the beautifully tempered quality of her tone was especially apparent in the adantino and the scherzo. The work made such a profound impression that Mme. Witek had to respond with an encore.

The program closed with a request number, Beethoven's sonata for piano and violin, op. 30, No. 3. So much thoughtful insight and tender sentiment went into the interpretation of this work by Mr. and Mrs. Witek that it seemed to be recreated before the audience, and conveyed to them the composer's own spirit. For that superb performance the audience had reason to be particularly thankful; it is not likely to be forgotten.

To enable the students of the von Ende School of Music, Herwegh von Ende, director, to combine their ability in a public appearance, an advanced students' recital took place at the school Friday evening, December 11. As this was the first recital of this season, many of the new promising pupils were heard for the first time, thereby enabling the audience to appreciate the efforts and efficiency of the faculty, as well as affording opportunity for the pupils to make their initial public appearance.

Military Mass in the Antwerp Cathedral.

Bonn, Germany, November 12, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

There was a grand and solemn service in the Antwerp Cathedral, a thanksgiving for the victory. When we entered the church the middle aisle was already filled with German soldiers. Several generals and high officers were seated in front of the altar praying in reverent attitude. In the aisle the young soldiers were kneeling side by side with the older bearded warriors and with the sailors, all attending the solemn high mass in deep devotion. Most of them were using their prayer books.

It was edifying to see those warriors who but a few days ago stood at the gates of Antwerp threatening the city, now humbly kneeling to God and praying before the altar where the army chaplain, assisted by the clergy of the Cathedral, was celebrating the solemn high mass.

I shall never forget the sight of those soldiers spending moments of perfect peace in that historical place of worship. No clattering of swords now, no war songs, the heads are bent low and those sturdy chests, many of them bearing the Iron Cross, are filled with feeling of prayer and of peace.

Then there came a moment I shall never forget. It was after the mass. Suddenly, from the choir gallery, the German Military Band began "Holy God, We Praise Thy Name." No sooner had the organ and the trumpets joined in when from thousands of voices broke forth the hymn of the warriors to honor God and to ask for His blessing. The trumpets were almost overpowered by that mighty chorus of deep warrior voices, and the pillars, which but a week ago were echoing the roar of the cannons that bombarded the city, tremble now with the thunder of that powerful German hymn of praise.

When the mass was over the troops left the church in perfect order. A small crowd of Antwerp people, standing outside the Cathedral gates, curiously watched the generals and other high officers who came out and rode away in their autos to reassume their severe duties of war. They were followed by their thousands of troops.

Very truly yours,

HANS MERX.

McMahon a Member of Cleveland Quartet.

James McMahon, the basso-cantante, continues to enjoy a busy season. In addition to his many other engagements Mr. McMahon is a member of the Cleveland Apollo Quartet, a popular organization in the Middle West. The other members of the quartet are Paul F. Kinnison, baritone; Harry E. Parker, lyric tenor, and Edward M. Rose, tenor robusto. The accompanist is Charles T. Ferry.

Marie Louise Wagner in Cincinnati.

A telegram from Marie Louise Wagner to her teacher, Sergei Klibansky, has been received by him, and reads as follows:

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 12, 1914.

Sergei Klibansky, 212 West Fifty-ninth street, New York:

Rejoice with me. Concert big success. Thanks to you.

MARIE LOUISE WAGNER.

German Music and the Russian Spirit.

(John F. Runciman in the London Saturday Review.)

What is the secret of the decay of German music? A correspondent of the Saturday Review has suggested that Strauss' "Salome" is characterized by "languorous and stifling strains" which nauseate, and that the harmonies of "Elektra" are "fierce and brutal." This does not take us far. These things have little to do with the modern German spirit, or, as I much prefer to call it, the Prussian spirit? If "brutal harmonies" and "languorous strains" are to prove anything, are to support in the slightest degree any theory, what shall we infer from the fierce harmonies of Scriabin, the Russian, and the languor of Debussy, the Frenchman? The harmonies of "Elektra" are those of "Salome," those of "Salome" the harmonies of "Elektra"; in neither the one opera nor the other is there anything harsher than can be found in the works of both Scriabin and Stravinsky. Modern German music does, indeed, reflect the modern German mind and ambition, and in a way none the less striking and convincing because it cannot be analyzed and defined in a vague and general charge. Long before Treitschek's time, battle pieces were painted, and we cannot truthfully say that they were inspired or affected by the Prussian spirit. Violent music and voluptuous music were put to paper before Strauss, and the fact of Strauss doing so today does not prove the domination of the Prussian spirit over his mind. All the same, Prussian ambitiousness and ideals do manifest their accursed selves in the music of Strauss and all the younger German composers, and it is perhaps worth while looking for the real signs of the deterioration and utter degradation at a time when the Germans are smashing every lovely and precious object that comes within range of their guns.

Wagner may sleep more easily in his grave if he has any means of learning in his underworld that writers in the English reviews find no traces of the modern or Hunnish spirit in his music, that they approve of his music. Whether he turns restively as he thinks of his prose writings is rather more a matter of reasonable doubt. It is in those writings we find the first indications of the pretentious spirit we all abhor and spurn aside from the musical mind. Wagner wrote more articles and essays than any other composer, not excepting, I believe, our beloved and very loquacious Berlioz. He was terribly addicted to the word Culture, and by Culture he meant only German Culture. If any one asks me what he meant by the term I am like his own Tristan: "Indeed, I cannot tell thee." Our difficulty is not lightened by the struggles he made to understand for himself the significance of the word German—e. g., "What is German?" and, indeed, passim, I am bound to assume—though it is the merest guess—that he meant the tastes and habit of mind fostered by study of Goethe, Schiller, Feuerbach and Schopenhauer, and the musical works of Beethoven and himself. It may have included as well an instinctive aversion to the Jews—who were, by the way, his ablest lieutenants, even if he was not one himself. Anyhow, the term apparently had for him a distinct meaning, and the stress he laid on the qualifying word German is shown by the scorn he poured on his own nation in "A Capitulation," where the apostle (as he considered) of French culture, Victor Hugo, makes a triumphant entry into the Fatherland. It is not the culture of Treitschke and the German Chancellor; it does not consist of wanton cruelty and Krupp guns; and it shows the modern influence chiefly in its impudent, arrogant, if naive and somewhat comical, assumption that no other culture existed worth mentioning beside it.

As Wagner grew older his national arrogance strengthened in him. The amended version of the magnificent essay on Beethoven, which I reckon the finest piece of musical criticism ever penned, is sorely damaged by allusion to "the world conquerors." This was immediately after 1871, when Wagner's fellow countrymen, the Saxons, had been driven upon the foe by their leaders, and had returned as heroes. Throughout the later writings we find hints of the Welt-Politik; bits of flattery also offered to the Prussian king who had conquered Saxony and Bavaria not less than France. But allowances must be made. Wagner was intent on realizing his Bayreuth dream, and he showed himself a little of a Prussian in allowing nothing to stand in his way. The friends who willingly helped him he mercilessly exploited; those who opposed him he trampled on—or tried to; the "neutral powers" he reckoned Laodiceans, and as good, therefore, or as bad, as declared enemies. Such a man would not stick at a little bounce that might please world conquering ears. It brought him nothing. The dedication of the glorious "Kaisermarsch," hailing in sickening phrases (I refer to the words), brought him a beggarly nothing. What cared (or care) the Hohenzollerns for music while there were guns to be made.

We see, then, in the prose works these few more or less significant hints of the new German attitude of mind, amounting on the whole to an intolerable pretentiousness, partly personal, but vastly augmented by the tide of national vainglory which swept away Wagner and many others. How does all this touch his music? it will be asked. Let us glance at the librettos of the man's art work, where, at any rate, he was always sincere. In "Lohengrin" we have the prophecy that German arms will always be victorious. Well, in our English operas, from Purcell's "King Arthur" to Arne's, we find a deal of boasting; though it must be admitted there is a difference between "Britains never will be slaves" and "Deutschland über alles." In "The Mastersingers" comes out Wagner's childish and harmless belief that song is "our" (German) art—forgetting Italy, the low countries, and even England, England which employed him, an exile, rejected of Germany; England which sent Beethoven, his idol, the last money he ever earned and did not live to receive. In the case of a normal being, even one of supreme talent, the intellectual convictions must have reacted on the creative faculty, and, besides shaping and coloring the music, must have determined the ideas to which he designed giving dramatic form. But Wagner the thinker was altogether different from Wagner the artist. When the artist rose up in his strength the cold thinker retired in confusion. He said that when he wrote "Tristan" he found he had got far beyond his theories. He had not—he had taken an entirely different road. The theories simply did not lie on the path leading from "Lohengrin" to the riper works. Anyhow, when we consider the "Ring" we see the reason of Nietzsche's instinctive rebellion against Wagner. Nietzsche was the teacher and scorner of Treitschke, and the central idea of the "Ring" is in dead opposition to all that he preached. Here is the fundamental, essential Wagner. Not the moral, but the basis, the material, of the "Ring" is that a world-domination by force can only be achieved by the sacrifice of the highest attributes of our manhood. The four operas work out Wotan's struggles to attain universal power without surrendering his manhood —for his godhead is only manhood at the nth power; his writhings and wrigglings and tortuous courses are all in vain, and in the final débâcle the hell he has let loose consumes him, his satellites, and his Walhalla—his Berlin. Old Kaiser Wilhelm saw the "Ring"—did he understand it? Frederick needed no such lesson. The present emperor has often sat it out; and it is obvious that the lesson has fallen on blind eyes and deaf ears. The cannon drowns all other music. Wotan was overruled by the Will to Power until he saw its emptiness and unfeasibility. Even Alberich, who had put away as encumbrances the essential qualities of manhood as completely and finally as Treitschke or Bernhardi, is an utter failure: this world is so constituted that the thing cannot be done. There is, I say, no moral to the "Ring": simply Wagner set forth in dramatic form what to him was a self-evident truth.

And the music? To Wagner a mastery of the material and devices of his art was indispensable, not for the sake of these things, but of the emotion to be expressed through them. The most tremendous of his utterances, to a musician, is the simple advice he gave to young composers: never modulate from one key to another while the original key serves you to say what you have to say. The glory and splendor of the earth, its loveliness and terrible beauty, filled his soul and found their way into his music; the tempests and passions of the spirit, its infinite longings, ecstasies, despairs, and its precious hours of golden serenity, all are there: the one thing of which no trace can be found is a vainglorious rejoicing in his own strength. As great a contrapuntist as Bach or Handel, he never, as they often do, employs his skill to bridge over an empty page: every rift is loaded with ore; he never spoke unless he had something to say, unless his heart overflowed and he had to find the notes. His intellectual route may have been at times modified by Prussian aspirations: his soul remained to the last unsmirched.

GREETINGS TO THE MUSICAL COURIER FROM CHARLES DALMORES, WHO IS NOW SERVING IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

PHILADELPHIA'S MUSICAL FARE.

"Quaker City" Visited by Flonzaley Quartet —World Renowned Artists Heard—Musical Art Club Gives Second Annual Concert.

Philadelphia, Pa., December 11, 1914.

The principal musical event of this week in Philadelphia was the first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet in Witherspoon Hall, Tuesday evening, under the direction of Robert Patterson Strine. As on the occasion of its last visit, this organization presented a program which was rather brief, but surcharged with interest for the musically informed. Two movements from the string quartet of Darius Milhaud constituted the novelty offering. In the hands of Adolfo Betti, its beautiful melodies took on the most extravagant charm and its intricate polyphony was well worked out by Alread Pochon, Ugo Ara, and Iwan D'Archambeau. But in spite of the skill of these artists, both individually and in unison, there are measures in this composition which we who still try to grasp music with our minds, believe are as far removed from the beautiful, as one pole from the other. For us the Tschaikowsky quartet in E flat major and the Haydn quartet in G major were more enjoyable for all the undeniable educational value of the other.

CONNELL WITH GERMANTOWN SOCIETY.

Horatio Connell was the soloist at the eleventh subscription concert of the Germantown Choral Society, under the direction of David E. Crozier, Tuesday evening. Mr. Connell sang two groups of songs, Gelbe's "Ave Maria" with ladies chorus, and Max Bruch's war song with men's chorus. In the last number Mr. Connell is superb. His rendering of both groups of songs, which included such works as Mozart's "A Warning" and Schubert's "Huntsman, Rest!" and "Wohin," was so distinctly forceful as to compel irresistible demands for encores. The accompanists were Mrs. Albert M. Hoyt and Dorothy Kidder.

CAPACITY HOUSE FOR SCHUMANN-HEINK AND GODOWSKY.

Ernestine Schumann-Heink attracted a capacity audience to the Metropolitan Opera House on the occasion of her first recital of the season last Friday evening. Leopold Godowsky, pianist, and Albert Cornfield, violin, also contributed to the program. Accompanists for the concert were Katharine Hoffman and Edith Mahon. Mme. Schumann-Heink was the object of a really unusual ovation after her rendition of Bach's "My Heart Ever Faithful" and Raff's "Be Still," while the audience gave constant testimony throughout the program of the keenest appreciation of the highly meritorious performance of Godowsky.

MUSICAL ART CLUB CONCERT.

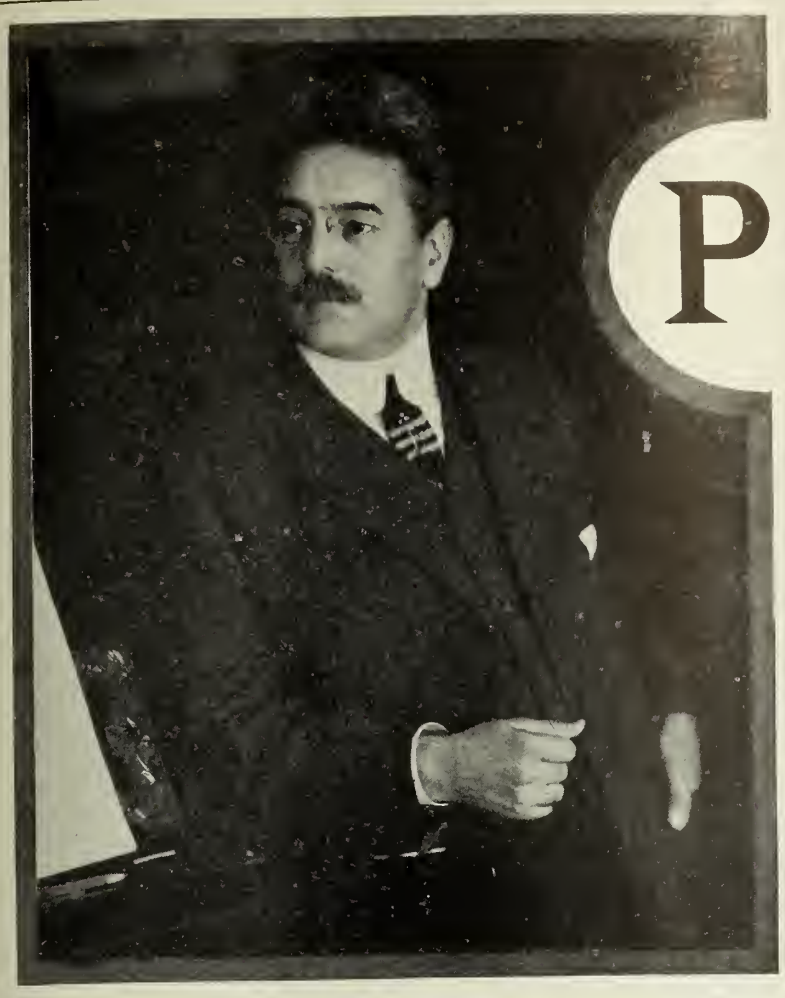
The second annual concert of the Musical Art Club in Witherspoon Hall last Wednesday evening proved quite as notable a success as the memorable concert in which this organization made its first bow to the public from the concert platform last year. The affair was largely attended by an audience which was highly representative of every department of musical activity in this city, and the rather lengthy program offered many artists who are well known from coast to coast.

Edwin Evans, who recently gave his annual recital in the same hall, sang several of the numbers, which made that affair distinctly notable.

Camille Zeckwer figured both as composer and virtuoso in a trio for piano, violin and viola, which proved one of the striking numbers on the program. In this he was assisted by Frederick Hahn and Charlton Murphy. Constantin von Sternberg, whose unsurpassed art is displayed here too seldom; Clarence K. Bawden, John K. Witzeman, Alfred Lorenz, Hans Kindler, Emil F. Schmidt, David Dubinsky, Hedda van den Beemt, and William A. Schmidt were among the other instrumentalists who contributed to the program. Among the vocalists were John F. Braun, Anthony D. McNichol, Harry Saylor, Henry Gurney and Henry Hotz.

H. P. QUICKSALL.

Reverse English.



The school concert had begun. Four little girls were dressed to represent the word "Star," and each had one letter of that word pinned onto her snowy-white dress Each letter began the verse of a touching little song.

"Now," said the teacher, "form yourselves in position, and wait until the curtain goes up."

The little girls did as they were told, and while the piano played the accompaniment the curtain went up.

Instead of applause to greet the little girls, howls from the audience met them.

The word they spelled was "Rats."—Montpelier (Vt.) Evening Argus.

LOUIS KOEMMENICH.

PRESS COMMENTS

on the Singing of

"The Dream of Gerontius,"

December 9, by the Oratorio Society of New York.

Work of the Conductor, Louis Koemmenich, Praised.

WITH a tenor soloist brought from England for the occasion the Oratorio Society began its season in Carnegie Hall last night, singing Sir Edward Elgar's "The Dream of Gerontius," most popular of modern English oratorios. It was the sixth time the work, a beautiful one that seems to stand the test of time well, has been performed by the same society, The first of oratorios to use dramatic orchestral effects in its accompaniment, it still surpasses the many that have been written imitating its style.

The Oratorio Society, which is again under the direction of Louis Koemmenich, is still a body of singers with good tone qualities, capable of singing difficult passages and of producing fine shadings of tone. It performed its part of the program well.

However, there is in the Elgar oratorio much solo work, and that of the tenor is most exacting. Gervase Elwes, the English artist, sang his music with feeling and proved equal to the task of singing almost continuously through the first half of the performance. His voice is not one that arouses admiration for its beauty of tone, but his enunciation was excellent, and in volume and range his voice is all that could be required. . . . Carnegie Hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience.—New York Herald, December 10, 1914.

The Oratorio Society last evening in Carnegie Hall gave its sixth performance of Sir Edward Elgar's remarkable choral work, "The Dream of Gerontius," under the direction of Louis Koemmenich. It again made the deep impression of an original and strong contribution to modern English music as it did in March, 1903, when the Oratorio Society first disclosed it to New York under Frank Damrosch's direction. The last of its several representations since the first New York performance was in March of last year, when it was given by the Catholic Oratorio Society.

A large part of the effect of the work depends upon the skill of the singer who interprets the emotions of Gerontius, in the first part of the oratorio, then of the Soul of Gerontius in the second, by the delivery of this "endless melody." . . . The part was sung by Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, who sang it here in 1909, and who has been the most authoritative exponent of the work in many performances of it in England. . . . The singing of the chorus in several passages of splendid nobility and impressiveness, as well as the complex chorus of demons was excellent. There are many difficulties here to be mastered, as there are in the orchestral part. Mr. Koemmenich showed that he had entered into the spirit of the oratorio and brought his forces to cope successfully with the numerous difficulties of Elgar's music.—New York Times, December 10, 1914.

"Gerontius" was performed for the sixth time by the Oratorio Society, which was the first organization to give it a hearing in America. Once before, as on this occasion, Gervase Elwes was brought from England to sing the principal part, and the action of Mr. Koemmenich and the directors of the society found complete justification in the contribution which the English artist gave to the performance of the oratorio—far and away the finest that the work has received in New York. Mr. Elwes has made Gerontius a specialty. . . . Choir and orchestra (that of the Symphony Society), were also in splendid form, and under Mr. Koemmenich gave a performance of Elgar's oratorio which breathed the spirit of Cardinal Newman's poem in every measure. The audience enjoyed a period of real spiritual refreshment and artistic uplift.—New York Tribune, December 10, 1914.

The first concert of the Oratorio Society season took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," founded on Cardinal Newman's poem, was sung by the society and a trio of distinguished soloists.

Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, who first came to America some six years ago to sing the leading part, was heard in the same role last evening. Mildred Potter sang the music of the Angel and Frank Croxton was bass soloist.

The singing of the chorus was highly creditable. The large body of singers was evidently well trained and rehearsed, and showed security in and knowledge of the several beautiful ensembles.

Mr. Elwes gave an intelligent and intelligible reading of the score and text; Miss Potter and Mr. Croxton were excellent in their respective roles; the orchestra played with inspiration and fine balance in its various choirs, and Mr. Koemmenich's conducting was lucid and authoritative.

The audience was large, interested and exceedingly appreciative.—New York American, December 10, 1914.

Sir Edward Elgar's musically dramatic and beautiful oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," had its first performance in this city since 1909 last evening in Carnegie Hall.

Effectively conducted by Louis Koemmenich, the chorus singing of the Oratorio Society and that provided by Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, gave to the interpretation of this noble work the most finished it has had in this city.

In the choruses, "Kyrie Eleison," "Be Merciful" and "Rescue Him, O Lord," the singers' attack was notably precise and their shading admirable in its variety. The New York Symphony Orchestra provided a support good in both tone and phrasing and performed the preludes with much finish.

The finest singing of the evening, however, was furnished by Mr. Elwes. Considering that he arrived here from England only a few hours before stepping upon Carnegie Hall stage, his achievement was remarkable.

Mildred Potter, a well schooled mezzo soprano, and Frank Croxton, baritone, were the soloists assisting in the presentation of the oratorio.—New York World, December 10, 1914.

The beautiful work was surely never better done. At the end of two hours the audience and chorus stood applauding Louis Koemmenich who led it.

He must be a hardened listener who could hear such proclamation last night without a catch at the throat and a mist before the eyes. Elgar's sincerity won Richard Strauss and the Germans as no other Englishman ever had since Purcell. Mr. Elwes, with finely sympathetic tenor and superb unforced diction, gave a new estimate of his artistic stature to many who heard him once before in New York. Mildred Potter sang the Guardian Angel, and Frank Croxton the Angel of Agony and the Priest. The chorus, still lacking in men, showed a fresh voiced enthusiasm and a heart in its work that would be hard to match in the Oratorio Society's forty-odd years.—New York Evening Sun, December 10, 1914.

Louis Koemmenich made much of the dramatic possibilities of the work, and his chorus was thoroughly responsive to his leadership. The uncouth song of the demons was particularly effective.—New York Evening Mail, December 10, 1914.

Conductor, choir, orchestra, soloists and audience combined to make the first concert of the Oratorio Society a completely satisfying evening and a great achievement.—New York Globe, December 10, 1914.

True, to each of the soloists, and to Mr. Koemmenich and to the chorus, applause, well deserved, was given, but it was restrained. Something like the "Parsifal" spirit prevailed.

Mr. Elwes has sung Gerontius so many times, in so many places, and is so identified with the character that he was brought over from England to sing it. His work was admirable. Frank Croxton's was not less worthy. As for Mildred Potter, it may be doubted that she has ever sung in more lovely voice, or with such grace of expression. The chorus had fine tonal quality and balance, reflecting credit upon Mr. Koemmenich's training.—New York Evening World, December 10, 1914.

The Oratorio Society gave the first concert of its season at Carnegie Hall last night. The work chosen for the occasion was Sir Edward Elgar's masterpiece, "The Dream of Gerontius." This grand oratorio, or cantata (it may fall into either category), was first given here by the Oratorio Society on March 26, 1903. It had not been heard previous to last evening since March 20, 1909. That it must from time to time be repeated is inevitable, for it retains its place as one of the best compositions of its kind.

It should also not be forgotten that this creation brings into brilliant prominence the singing of the chorus. There is a smaller vogue here for choral music than there ought to be in view of the master creations which have been made for the purpose of introducing it. Sir Edward Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius" claims a place among the distinguished compositions in the choral field and its splendid handling of vocal polyphony, as well as its nobly declaimed solo parts, is something which every music lover can enjoy.

Mr. Koemmenich's reading showed a real appreciation of the composition and both his tempi and his treatment of the nuances called for commendation. And, in fine, "The Dream of Gerontius" is so fresh and virile that it need not rest for another five years.

The performance of the work last evening was one of high merit. Louis Koemmenich, conductor of the society, had engaged Gervase Elwes, the English tenor, to cross the Atlantic especially for this concert. The contribution of the tenor to the evening's music proved the wisdom of Mr. Koemmenich. Mr. Elwes' voice was always a peculiarly even one, but it is capable of conveying feeling, and the singer has skill in his use of it.

Furthermore, despite of his long service as an interpreter of "The Dream of Gerontius," it was plain last seeming that the music still awoke his deepest sympathy. He sang it with great beauty of style, with good phrasing and with much emotional warmth. His delivery of the great solo beginning "Sanctus fortis, Sanctus Deus," was an admirable specimen of oratorio declamation of the best type.

The other soloists were Mildred Potter, contralto, and Frank Croxton, bass. The orchestra was that of the Symphony Society and Franf Sealy was at the organ. The choruses had been very carefully rehearsed, and as a rule they were beautifully sung in respect of gradation and phrasing. The quality of tone was usually fairly good, but there will continue to be room for improvement in this so long as so many of the veterans keep their places in the ranks.—New York Sun, December 10, 1914.

Zoellner Quartet at Aeolian Hall.

At Aeolian Hall, New York, on Sunday evening, December 13, the Zoellner Quartet gave a program consisting of a quartet by Darius Milhaud, the Beethoven quartet, opus 18, No. 2, and the quartet in D, by Gustave Samazeuilh. The first and the last of these were heard for the first time in New York and not improbably also for the last time.

Of the two compositions that of Darius Milhaud is the most original. Mr. Milhaud is a young Frenchman, only twenty-two years old, and is already the author of a large number of works, including a symphony, concerto for piano and orchestra, numerous songs, piano pieces and chamber music. The quartet heard on Sunday evening showed him to be a composer of the most advanced school. Two movements of this work were played by the Flonzaley Quartet recently, and were the other two movements equal to these it would be easier to mete out unstinted praise to the work. This, however, is not the case. The work, taken as a whole, is too long, and becomes unutterably tiresome before the last note is reached. A little of such music goes a long way. Taken in large doses it resolves itself into an almost endless procession of obstruse harmonies and unpleasant discords, and much of it is entirely unsuited to the string quartet, as these harmonies, to be pleasing or even comprehensible, must be sustained.

Gustave Samazeuilh, who was born in 1877, has less originality than Milhaud and his harmonies are perhaps a little less obstruse, but his work is not so interesting as that of the younger man, nor is it any better suited to the string quartet.

Both of these works received careful treatment by the Zoellner Quartet, who, however, did their best work in the Beethoven Quartet, which was delightfully interpreted. The Zoellners deserve much praise for bringing forward new works so as to give the New York public an opportunity to hear what the younger school of Europe is doing, even though the works themselves are without especial value and are not likely to become regular features on our chamber music programs. It is always of interest to have an opportunity to hear them and it is a thing which the New York public should certainly not be denied.

Sinfonia Fraternity Meets in Philadelphia.

Philadelphia was the scene last week of the fourteenth annual convention of the Sinfonia Fraternity of America, one of the largest fraternities devoted entirely to the advancement of music in this country. Delegates from twelve of the thirteen chapters of the organization held a three day business session in Combs Conservatory of Music, where they were the guests of the Beta Chapter, and gave a concert devoted almost entirely to American composers.

Out of the mass of routine business transacted at the convention and the various suggestions for the promotion of musical interest in this country, the election of Gilbert Raynolds Combs to the national presidency of the organization stands out as the most important. Mr. Combs is one of the earliest and most active organizers of the society and a past supreme president; and it was not altogether unexpected when, at the closing business session on Wednesday afternoon, he was chosen to guide the organization for the coming year.

The prize of $100 in gold for the male chorus with soli and piano accompaniment was awarded to Charles Henry Prutting at the concert on Tuesday evening. Honorable mention went to Gustav Mehner, of Grove City, Pa. The prize winning composition of last year, a trio, was performed at the concert by Earl Beatty, pianist; Clarence M. Cox, violinist, and Franz Kuschan, cello. Other soloists were Gertrude Hayden Fernley, Marie Stone Langston, Paul Volkman, Jacob Garber and Nellie Wilkinson.

Telegrams and letters of congratulation were received at the convention from the following honorary members: David Bispham, Eden D. Jordan, Louis C. Elson, Victor Herbert, Peter C. Lutkin, Carl Busch, Henry Hadley and F. van der Stucken. Other prominent members of the organization include Dr. Hugh A. Clarke, Henry Schradieck, Leopold Stokowski, Leopold Godowsky, A. J. Gantvoort, Gilbert Raynolds Combs, George W. Chadwick and the late Theodore Thomas.

Students and delegates from the chapters in the following institutions attended the convention: New England Conservatory of Music; Combs Conservatory; Detroit Conservatory; Ithaca Conservatory; University School, Ann Arbor, Mich; Cincinnati College; Syracuse University; Peabody Conservatory, Baltimore; De Pauw, Greencastle, Ind.; School of Fine Arts, Oklahoma; Denison University, Granville, Ohio; University of Kansas; Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, and the Sinfonia Club of New York.

"Art Life" by Studio Club.

The Studio Club of New York has started a paper of which volume one, number one, is dated New York, December, 1914, and the title of which is Art Life. In an editorial introduction, the purpose of the magazine and a short account of the work of the Studio Club of New York is given as follows:

"As this, the first issue of Art Life, goes to press, we of the Studio Club of New York are entering upon a new era of our existence. Our members are scattered far and near, our interests have expanded, and our ideals are so hard to realize that we feel we need the sympathetic, hearty coöperation of the public to further them.

"We stretch out our hands to all our members, to students who have never joined the club, and above all to the professional men and women who make up the great artistic world of New York. We ask you that you will help us lay deep the foundations of our work, that this club may become the center of all that is true and pure and beautiful in art, that the public may look to us for incentive and inspiration to maintain high standards, and that our opinion may really count for something in the community.

"Why should New York not have a Latin Quarter, bereft of its undesirable features, with the Studio Club as its spring, from which shall flow noble life expressed in noble art? Our student members go from this city to Paris, to Rome and to Vienna; can we not secure for them clarity of vision, purity of life and beauty of ideal, that they may take a real contribution to the great art centers of the world?

"Will you not rally round us and help to make our voice heard and to create a demand for the noblest things in art? Without you we can do but little; with you the possibilities of the Studio Club have no limit.

"MARY D. BAKER."

The Studio Club is a worthy organization, conducted on philanthropic lines and furnishing a comfortable home for artists and musicians residing either temporarily or permanently in New York.

Leopold Wolfsohn's Pupils at Wanamaker's.

Leopold Wolfsohn, one of New York's piano teachers, offered a program of unusual interest on Saturday afternoon, December 12, at the Wanamaker Auditorium, New York. The following of his artist-pupils participated: Adele Bouchere Smith, Max Drittler, Rita Marx, Martha Leiser, Alice Potter Delahay and Ida Warner.

The same careful training was noticeable among each of these students, which speaks well for the excellent work done by Mr. Wolfsohn.

National Opera Club Meets.

The last meeting of the National Opera Club was held in the Baedt Apartments, Waldorf-Astoria, New York, on Thursday, December 10. The subject of the day was "Early French Opera"; the chairman, Adrienne Remenyi von Ende. The president, Mme. Evans von Klenner, announced that the board of directors had subscribed for a large number of seats for the fourteen Saturday evening performances to be given at the Metropolitan Opera House, beginning Saturday evening, January 23, and urged all of the members to avail themselves of this splendid opportunity for becoming acquainted with the operas now being presented by the Metropolitan Opera Company. More than half of the seats were engaged before the close of the session. The club now numbers nearly five hundred members, a growth which indicates the interest in the club's object, i. e., the furthering of educational work in music, and the consideration and discussion of opera and the higher forms of music.

The second portion of the program illustrated the subject of the day.

Mme. Schumann-Heink Appears.

Enormous enthusiasm greeted the appearance of Mme. Schumann-Heink at Aeolian Hall last Sunday afternoon, December 13, where she was the soloist at the concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra. The diva sang Andromache's lament from Bruch's "Achilleus," Erda's scene from "Rheingold," and Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung," and in these three big numbers covered herself with glory. The wonderful Schumann-Heink organ was poured forth with the usual lavishness of its possessor and was found to be as rich in quality and as adaptable in emotional expression as it was in the most brilliant days of her operatic career. Also the rare interpretative art, the keen sense of dramatic values in text and music, and the unfailing taste that always have marked the Schumann-Heink performances were present in abundance at her latest appearance here. Anything more commanding in style and more noble in delivery than the singer's rendering of the Wagner excerpts could not well be imagined. She truly is a queen of song. Her triumph was well deserved.

The orchestra gave a top heavy reading of Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, a work for which the conductor appeared to lack the proper facile imagination, stimulative rhythmic response, and lightness of interpretative touch. A serenade for strings, by Fuchs, proved to be milk and watery material of little charm or interest. Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz" needs more "demonism" and biting humor than the comfortable New York Symphony Orchestra leader seemed to have at his command for the presentation.

Bowes Studio Recital.

Charles Bowes' recent studio recital was another success. Mr. Bowes intends to vary these programs by adding other talent besides his own pupils. This will consist of instrumentalists as well as vocalists.

His "Tuesday afternoons" are a delight to the serious minded music lover.

Mr. Bowes will sing next Tuesday three manuscript songs by Mrs. H. R. Chambers, as he likes to encourage the American composer where merit is found.

Reception for Fremstad.

Olive Fremstad was the guest of honor at a reception given by the MacDowell Club of New York, at its club house on Tuesday afternoon of last week. In the receiving line with Mme. Fremstad were Mr. and Mrs. John A. Alexander and Mr. and Mrs. A. K. Stokes. Mr. Alexander was the first president of the MacDowell Club and Mr. Stokes is president at the present time. The guests, to the number of about five hundred, were presented to the diva by a corps of ushers in charge of Walter Bogert.

HAMLIN'S NEW YORK TRIUMPH

RECITAL ON DECEMBER NINTH

Press Comments:

AMERICAN TENOR PLEASES.

"Mr. Hamlin gave many encores. As an interpreter of song he has few superiors and his recital gave real pleasure. He always brought out the underlying spirit of the works."— New York Herald, December 10th, 1914.

"A recital of musically admirable songs which reflected judicious taste in selection was given yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall by George Hamlin, the tenor. The program was one of special interest to students and lovers of music because of its catholicity.

"Mr. Hamlin proved himself, as he frequently has in the past, an intelligent artist."
—Pierre V. Key, in New York World, December, 10th, 1914.

POPULAR TENOR GIVES AN INTERESTING RECITAL OF SONGS.

"Mr. Hamlin is well and favorably known to local music lovers as a singer in oratorio as well as in the form of entertainment in which he was heard yesterday. He has also sung with the Philadelphia-Chicago Opera Company. His audience yesterday bestowed abundant applause upon him.

"Mr. Hamlin sang with unfailing taste and intelligence. There are few in the song recital field who can sustain the general level of an entertainment more successfully than he. His interpretations are well planned and his method of delivery is well suited to their presentation."— William J. Henderson, New York Sun, December 10th, 1914.

"Mr. Hamlin's singing had all the high intelligence, the gift for interpretation, for conveying the spirit and significance of a musical setting that have before been admired in it. There are excellence and clearness of diction and a carefully considered declamation that give point and pregnancy, and that are not allowed to interfere with the musical flow; there is well modeled phrasing, and there is the elusive spirit of vitality that rarely escapes from Mr. Hamlin's style. In low ranges Mr. Hamlin often gave a beautiful mezza voce."— New York Times, December 10th, 1914.

"A much less beautiful voice than that of Mr. Hamlin would be well worth hearing if used with the understanding and finesse which he has set at his command. His Schubert and Schumann songs were admirably interpreted, and he sings Richard Strauss as few Americans do."— The Evening Mail, December 10th, 1914.

"Mr. Hamlin's manner of singing is too familiar to need extended comment. It is remarkable for the skillful use of the voice in the interest of a just interpretation. Mr. Hamlin sings songs with intelligence, with feeling, with style, and with the authority of a man long practised in the art."— The Globe and Commercial Advertiser, New York, December 10, 1914.

HAMLIN IN FINE VOICE PLEASES BIG AUDIENCE.

"Being in unusually good voice yesterday, Mr. Hamlin gave more than ordinary satisfaction. Seldom in recent years has he given more pleasure to his admirers.

"He was heard to greatest advantage, perhaps, in Schumann's 'Der Hidalgo,' which he sang with contagious vigor and animation."—Max Smith, in New York Press, December 10th, 1914.

Mr. Hamlin, for the past three seasons singing leading tenor parts with the Chicago-Philadelphia Grand Opera Company and a recognized authority on Oratorio and Songs, will accept a limited number of singers for coaching, etc., when professional engagements permit at Aeolian Hall. By appointment only.

Address: care of Haensel and Jones, Aeolian Hall, New York.

"Mr. Hamlin has sung songs for us for years and his excellent qualities have never failed of appreciation. It has not been possible for all to admire the quality of his voice, but no discriminating lover of song—German song in especial—has been able or desirous to withhold admiration for his splendid ability as an interpreter of the highest form of lyricism. He is intellectual and also emotional. All that brains, healthy sentiment, sound training and artistic sincerity can suggest he has enlisted in the service of his art. And it was a pleasure to observe how these good qualities were appreciated by his audience yesterday."— H. E. Krehbiel, in New York Tribune, December 10th, 1914.

"Das Organ Hamlins hat sich den sympathischen und gelegenlich eindringlich winkenden Klang voll bewahrt, die Phrasirung hat an Rundung gewonnen. Technisch bietet Hamlin viel Schönes, namentlich ein virtuoses und doch nie manirirt wirkendes Verhauchen und ein bis in die letzten Schwingungen hörbares Piano. Seinen Schubert und Schumann singt der Künstler mit ebenso viel Intelligenz, als tönendem Leben."
—New-Yorker Staats-Zeitung, Friday, December 11, 1914.

"George Hamlin, a singer of international repute, gave a recital of tenor songs in Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon.

"Mr. Hamlin's voice has beauty, power and compass and he sang with intelligence and dramatic effect. His conception of lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Strauss and other German composers demonstrated familiarity with and sympathy in that particular field.

"The audience was charmed with three little songs by Van Eyken, Fleck and Sinding, and also by Mr. Hamlin's delicate and artistic readings of these.

"Mrs. Beach's 'Deine Blumen' and Ganz's 'Nachtgesang' (each of which was dedicated to Mr. Hamlin) were exquisite in outline and melodiousness and especially fitted to the singer's style and equipment."— New York American, December 10th, 1914.

"Yesterday afternoon the much admired tenor, George Hamlin, gave a recital in Aeolian Hall, which was heard by a large audience. He added to his good repute yesterday by his satisfying interpretation of more than a score of airs and songs by German, Austrian, French, Scandinavian and American composers. Mr. Hamlin bestowed the conscientious labor necessary for technical accomplishment; and to this he added the good taste, the distinct enunciation, and the other good qualities for which he is distinguished."—The Evening Post, New York, December 10, 1914.

"The song recital by George Hamlin in Aeolian Hall had a program of unhackneyed, early-composer music, and very modern songs which were gloriously sung. Fleck's 'Ich und Du' revealed such admirable style in the singer that it had to be repeated."— The Brooklyn Daily Eagle, Thursday, December 10th, 1914.

"George Hamlin, the tenor, at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon gave one of the artistic song recitals for which he is famous. His taste is rare and his gifts of expression are manifold."— The Evening World, Thursday, December 10th, 1914

GEORGE HAMLIN, TENOR, DELIGHTS IN CONCERT.

"That Mr. Hamlin was not forgotten by metropolitan music lovers during his long absence from this city was shown plainly by the enthusiastic welcome he was given when he appeared on the platform. His voice was clear and resonant, and he has developed to a degree close to perfection the art of song interpretation. He brought out all the beauty of the works he sang to the intense pleasure of the audience. Again and again encores were demanded."

—Brooklyn Times, December 10th, 1914.

MR. GEORGE HAMLIN, Distinguished American Tenor

For Concert Engagements, Address: Haensel & Jones, Aeolian Hall, New York

Jenny Dufau and Maud Powell in Des Moines

Des Moines is growing into a musical center of importance, and is offering to its audiences the very best programs and artists. This season has thus early brought to the fore a list of the best names in the musical world, nor have their appearances suffered from the general depression under which public entertainments in some other places are laboring. A large and enthusiastic audience crowded Plymouth Church to attend the joint recital of Jenny Dufau, prima donna of the Chicago Grand Opera

JENNY DUFAU.

Company, and Maud Powell, the noted American violinist. "A double recital, doubly enjoyable," to quote the words of Nita Cherry, critic of the Des Moines Capital. "The combined appearance of these two artists was one of the most delightful events in a musical way Des Moines has enjoyed in a long time. Each one of these artists is fully capable of pleasing an audience with an entire program of her own, but their double recital was indeed a treat.

"Jenny Dufau, chic, dainty and very French, was charming. She has a flutelike voice, a splendid example of the coloratura type, which was brilliantly evidenced in the aria from the "Barber of Seville," the closing number of her opening group. She has an expressive personality which adds greatly to the appealing power of her songs. 'Elfenlied' and 'Wiegenlied' were soft and sweet; 'Beau Soir' was tender, and 'Les Filles des Cadiz' saucy and dramatic.

"Her English group included four songs, which were beautifully sung; two of them were especially pretty—a pleading Irish love song and an airy number, 'The Leaves and the Wind,' the words of which are familiar to every child, and not a single word was lost, as Miss Dufau sings the English with enviable clarity and the best of enunciation. To her accompanist, Charles Lurvey, is due much credit for his sympathetic interpretation of the numbers. The two artists proved indeed a source of great delight to the musical set of Des Moines."

"Siegfried" at Harvard Stadium.

"Siegfried," the third opera of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen," will be given a gigantic open air performance at the Harvard Stadium in Boston, Mass., about June 3, 1915. Alfred Hertz will conduct an orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera House, augmented to 125 players. The participating artists chosen in part from the Metropolitan opera forces, will constitute one of the most famous casts ever assembled for a single performance in America. The artists will be Rudolph Berger, as Siegfried; Johanna Gadska as Brünhilde; Ernestine Schumann-Heink as Erda; Alma Gluck as Waldvögel; Albert Reiss as Mimi; Otto Goritz as Alberich; Clarence Whitehill as Wotan and Basil Ruysdael as Fafner.

The performance will be under the personal direction of William R. MacDonald, whose name is familiar to the Boston opera world, and S. Kronberg, an impresario of renown, and who was closely connected with Maurice Grau in the days of the latter's regime at the Metropolitan Opera House. Nothing will be spared by the management toward making this novel operatic performance one of the most important musical events this country has ever had. A new innovation for America, which is in reality a repetition of a similar experiment put through with great success some seasons ago at Leipsic, will be the natural stage decorations, composed in large part of actual trees, giving as near as possible the effect of real forest scenes. The immense stage to be erected, with the orchestra pit, will occupy nearly a third of the huge stadium proper. There will be about 20,000 seats at a maximum price of $2.50. Arrangements are being made to erect a limited number of boxes in the most desirable location of the great arena. The designing and execution of the stage effects will be carried out by foremost European stage directors, and in order to perfect the acoustics of the great inclosure a large shell, or soundboard, will be built around and above the stage. It is surprising to note the rapid rate at which subscriptions are being received daily, even at this early date, for tickets. The office of the management subscription department has been established at the warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 162 Boylston street, Boston, Mass.

Baldwin-Tietjens Lecture-Recital.

A lecture-recital by Adele Laeis Baldwin, assisted by Paul Tietjens, was given on Wednesday afternoon, December 9, at the First Methodist Church, Bridgeport, Conn., under the auspices of the Bridgeport Musical Club. The program included works by Schubert, Brahms, Rachmaninoff, Massenet and others of the modern school, and two songs by Paul Tietjens, which were highly successful. The composer played the accompaniments of these songs, winning the recognition and appreciation of the audience.

Bernhard Steinberg, Voice Specialist.

Bernhard Steinberg, cantor of Temple Beth-El, one of the most prominent of positions of its kind in America, requiring a beautiful voice, a vast amount of Hebraic erudition, ready resources as to selection and appropriateness of music, is a conspicuous personage in New York's musical life. This official position alone would make him so. When to it is added that he finds time, in the midst of arduous duties, to give a vocal recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, as he did last season; to visit Boston, as he did recently, giving a progam of "Traditional Hebraic Music," and winning laurels (echoed in the reprint in the MUSICAL COURIER of flattering notices); remembering also his appearance of two years ago in London, England, in a similar concert, then one notes that Mr. Steinberg is not alone a cantor, but also a public singer, who has won success in important art centers.

His public singing naturally brought about inquiries for instruction, and in response to this urging Mr. Steinberg reserves two days weekly, and is busy from morning until night with pupils of all degrees of advancement. He has a beautiful residence-studio at 62 West Ninety-sixth street, convenient to elevated, subway and surface railway lines. A long, high parlor floor, with grand piano, excellent light, and the connecting reception room, both exquisitely furnished, comprise his teaching headquarters. Needless to say that no man can sing as he can without knowing just how to do it; it is this knowledge, coupled with sympathetic understanding of the singer's needs, and what might be called "the teaching talent," that has brought Bernhard Steinberg his success as a teacher. Another reason is the fact that his proficient pupils obtain paying positions. Many of them occupy responsible, well paying places in the musical world, such as choirs of churches and synagogues, musical comedies, etc. Five who have been recently placed in such positions are Mera Weinstock, soprano, who has a beautiful voice, and plans to give a recital of German lieder at Aeolian Hall later; Mrs. J. Levine, alto, member of the choir of Beth-El Synagogue; Elsie Goldsmith, soprano, singing in church and concert; Samuel Lobman, bass, similarly engaged, and Boris Beresin, tenor, who plays and sings the part of "Caruso" in a vaudeville sketch which is making a hit. In this he comes on in costume when this name is announced, singing "Ridi, Pagliacci" and other Caruso hits, with tremendous effect.

Mr. Steinberg will give his own annual recital at Aeolian Hall in February, 1915.

Mrs. MacDowell's Donation.

(From London Musical News.)

The committee for music in war time has received an extremely interesting communication from the widow of Edward MacDowell, America's foremost composer, whose work of late is becoming increasingly known and earning substantial royalties. From these royalties she has set aside the sum of £5 and forwarded it to Messrs. Elkin & Co., the music publishers, requesting them to give it "where it is most needed" in the British professional world of music. She writes: "I hope you all know really how intense the sympathy is here." Thus, though the sum is not of any magnitude, the lady invests it with the added value which attaches to sympathetic words spoken from country to country. Edward MacDowell in his lifetime doubtless had warm sympathies with both the countries engaged in the war—he was trained in Leipsic.

Kingston Creates Sensation in Chicago.

Morgan Kingston, as Rhadames, made his debut in Chicago in this role and proved himself a tenor of admirable qualification. His voice is robust and powerful and he sings the music with thorough understanding. Especially well did he acquit himself of his task in the Nile scene.—Chicago Examiner.

Morgan Kingston, as Rhadames in "Aida," is a fine looking man and he showed that he is a true tenor, with the range and quality of tone to sing the heroic parts, the longer he sang the better it was, and his voice remained fresh to the end, so that he did some of his best singing in the final scene.—Chicago Evening Post.

The company is in possession of an admirable tenor in Morgan Kingston. . . . Mr. Kingston sang his music with a voice of power and excellent quality. Even the tricky and exacting "Celeste Aida" did not find him wanting, and he made much of many an aria after that. There can be no doubt that the tenor's Rhadames was distinctly a credit to him.—Chicago Herald.

The tenor Morgan Kingston pleased more and more as the evening went on.—Chicago Tribune.

Morgan Kingston, the much heralded British importation, proved to be a tenor of robust character, quite able to stand at the head of such an organization as now is to edify Chicago. In the role of Rhadames he sang the "Celeste Aida" aria better than it is usually sung.—Chicago Daily News.

Kingston is a great singer; he was one of Dippel's discoveries in England. He bears a striking resemblance to the old pictures of Laurence Barrett. His voice is a robust tenor, of thrilling quality, and charged with the vigor and enthusiasm of youth. He will be a much-talked-of artist before the Century company leaves Chicago. He did not make the mistake of trying to act too much in his role of Rhadames, but carried himself easily and gracefully.—Chicago Daily Journal. (Advertisement.)

Marion E. Gibson Sings in York.

Marion E. Gibson, soprano, was the assisting soloist at a piano recital, given by Emma Bosshart, in York, Pa., December 8.

This was the program:

Wittgenstein's New York Encomiums.

This pianist was heard here last season, when he won favor for playing which disclosed genuine talent and no little artistic achievement. With youth in his favor, he furthermore gave much promise for the removal of some striking technical deficiencies it contained, as also for the acquirement of a less exaggerated style. Of his performance last night let it be said at the outset that it was one showing a decided gain in intelligent judgment and at the same time offered much real musical enjoyment. The program was of superior range. . . .

Mr. Wittgenstein approached the task of the evening with a fine dignity of purpose and it little mattered what the composition in hand, he presented it from start to finish with a certain security in performance that in itself won the confidence of his listeners. His playing of the Brahms music was first of all straightforward and clear, and that of the Beethoven sonata thoroughly interesting. . . . As it is, he is one of the few wholly manly and interesting young players of the piano heard here within recent time.—New York Sun.

. . . His clean-cut technical ability, fine musicianship and tonal command won his audience at once. His beautiful staccato touch showed to advantage in the second movement of Beethoven's sonata, op. 31, No. 3. His readings of the works of Brahms, Beethoven, Cesar Franck and Chopin proved his power to express the higher ideals in music. Mr. Wittgenstein closed his program with a brilliant rendition of MacDowell's "Etude de Concert," but the audience repeatedly recalled the artist until he responded with an encore.—New York Evening Telegram.

His program . . . met with real appreciation and at the close of the evening he received what would in former years have been called "an ovation." He proved that he has remarkable technical skill and real understanding and appreciation of the compositions in the program, though Mr. Wittgenstein's style found its truest expression in Chopin "Etudes" and in the last group, which consisted of two numbers by Goldmark and an "Etude de Concert," by MacDowell, the latter, especially, being played with genuine understanding and sympathy. . . .—Brooklyn Daily Eagle.

McConnell Vocal Trio Pleases.

The members of the McConnell Vocal Trio, consisting of Marie McConnell, first soprano; Minnie M. McConnell, second soprano, and Harriet McConnell, contralto, were the main artists at a concert given on Thursday evening, December 10, in the Assembly Hall of Public School No. 66, New York.

The trio sang "Hark, Hark, the Lark," Schubert, and "Sigh No More, Ladies," Foote.

Marie McConnell chose for her solo number "If You Would Love Me," McDermid, while Harriet McConnell's selections were "Call Me No More," Cadman, and "Loss and Gain," Stebbins. Their work was greatly appreciated. Incessant applause followed every number, and the artists were compelled to respond with several encores.

David Bispham and His Audiences.

It is somewhat strange to say of an artist who has been continuously before the public the number of years that David Bispham has been before the audiences of Europe and America, that he is getting better acquainted with them than formerly, but such is the case. This artist has put himself more closely in touch with his hearers than ever before. Mr. Bispham says he believes that this is because he brings them his messages in their own language, but this is not the only fact in the case. Mr. Bispham has acquired the habit lately of talking a bit to his audiences before the program, or here and there on his programs, where he feels that he has something of interest to say, and it is certain that he has never been more beloved, popular and more eagerly sought for than he is now.

He experienced some disappointment early in the season because the play which was written for him was not to be ready this season.

"But," said the singer, "I guess everything is planned for the best, as it would have made me terribly sorry to have been compelled to refuse all the engagements for concerts that have been coming along."

Mr. Bispham's December dates include a return appearance at Galesburg, Ill., where he sang in October, and was reengaged immediately for December 14, in the artists' course given by the voice teacher, Anna Groff-Bryant. In this course also are Mme. Schumann-Heink, Alma Gluck, John McCormack and others of equal importance.

One of the most important concerts of early December was given Friday afternoon, December 11, in Washington, D. C., at the Columbia Theatre, where he went, after having sung in Pittsburgh, December 10.

Among his early January appearances will be concerts in Boston and in Louisville, Ky.

Mr. Bispham is trying to arrange his dates so as to give him breathing time around the holidays and to prepare for a long list which is now being booked for him by Frederic Shipman, who managed so skillfully his recent Australian tour.

Owing to financial reasons, the Barmen Opera will remain closed this winter.

MRS. CLARK'S RECITAL WINS HIGH PRAISE

Proves Right to Place Among Best Artists at First Appearance Here

HAS REMARKABLE VOICE

Mrs. Frank King Clark, an American singer hitherto unknown to local music lovers, gave a song recital yesterday afternoon in Aeolian Hall. Mrs. Clark is the widow of an American teacher of singing, Frank King Clark, who was for years located in Paris and afterward in Berlin. She was his assistant in recent years and for that reason did not appear in public. She came here without any preliminary heralding and without any undue ceremony walked quietly yesterday afternoon into a place among the best concert artists before this public.

Mrs. Clark is a splendid illustration of what a devoted pupil can get from an accomplished and faithful teacher. She has a remarkably beautiful natural voice of uncommon character. It is a mezzo soprano, with a strongly marked contralto quality and is particularly well suited to the duties of a song recital.

Her tone production is almost perfect. From the bottom of its scale to the top this voice sings every tone in the same place. Not one falls into the back of the throat; all are forward, smooth, round and clear. Hence the "registers" are perfectly equalized. Mrs. Clark has breath support which will be the envy of many ill trained singers, and she phrases with breadth and ease. Her tones are easily sustained and graded in her long phrases, and at no time yesterday did she seem to have exhausted her breath resources.

Her enunciation is of the first order in all four of the languages in which she was heard. She sang all her vowels purely in every part of her scale and indulged in no violent modification. She formed her words neatly and without interference with her tones. There was no difficulty whatever in understanding the text of her songs.

Her singing, however, cannot rest upon its admirable technic alone. For that reason it is pleasant to add that while she did not display any great depth of emotion she sbowed a fine mastery of style, fastidious taste, delicate and sometimes tender sentiment, and touches of archness and fancy. She began with "Quel Rusceletto," which was well sung, but she gave the first disclosure of the full measure of her art in Rontani's "Se bel rio," which was delivered with great beauty of style and expression.

Schumann's "Der Nussbaum," a good test in this town, where it is so often sung, had to be repeated after an exquisitely polished delivery. Her singing of the last line of the song in one phrase instead of two—as it is usually sung, to the detriment of Schumann's melody—was an excellent example of her application of her breath support to artistic purpose. "Jemand" gave her opportunity to show her delicate humor, while Tschaikowsky's "Pendant le Bal" and Moussorgsky's "Aux Bords du Don," both sung in French, revealed charming moods of poetic reflection.

On the whole, then, Mrs. Clark claims serious consideration as a singer who has the voice, the mechanism and the intelligence to give much pleasure to lovers of really good singing. She arrived quietly, but it is likely that her stay will be long. Kurt Schindler played the accompaniments with excellent taste. W. J. HENDERSON.

MRS. FRANK K. CLARK SINGS

First Appearance of an American Singer from Paris

It is not often that expectations are so agreeably met as they were in the singing of Mrs. Frank King Clark, who appeared in Aeolian Hall yesterday in a song recital. She is an American who has lived in Paris, a pupil and now the widow of an American who made a name for himself there as a teacher; and she herself has sung successfuly in Europe.

Mrs. Clark has a contralto voice of power and not a little richness of quality; it is most agreeable when it is not used powerfully, and in mezza voce and piano it has real charm. Even more than the voice is her artistic use of it. It is admirably poised, admirably responsive to her demands upon it, free and spontaneous in emission and in its modulation to all degrees of power. Her breath control is unusually ample, and this, with the discernment and artistic intelligence that govern her singing, enables her to achieve beautiful results in phrasing.

The program that Mrs. Clark presented yesterday showed that she has a real command over a large variety of styles. There are voices more sympathetic in quality than hers, but she made the fullest use of all it could be made to yield in music of the elder Italians; two beautiful old English songs, one arranged by Percy Grainger with much tact and one by Lane Wilson, a group by Schumann, a group of modern French and Russian songs in French, and another of American. In these languages Mrs. Clark's diction was good; there was fine and sensitive feeling for the varied emotional content of the songs, and there was success in delineating that content in performance. It was a recital that gave satisfaction to lovers of good singing. RICHARD ALDRICH.

CINCINNATI NEEDS A MUSICAL CLEARING HOUSE.

Musical Courier Correspondent Points Out Some Significant Facts—Too Many Concerts in a Week Usually Followed by Dearth for a Month—More Care in Booking Suggested as Remedy

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 8, 1914.

It can but be evident to the most casual observer of things musical, that what this city stands in need of at present is a clearing house for concerts. A bureau of exchange, located downtown at some accessible point, perhaps in one of the music stores, with a competent, unprejudiced person in charge who would advise with managers about dates and furnish information about future bookings, would be an invaluable asset to the musical life of the community. As things go at present Cincinnati has all her concerts in one week and then none for a month. The weeks when the symphony concerts occur are invariably filled with faculty concerts, student recitals, glee clubs, choral societies and "debut" performances, not to mention the artists who happen to be "jumping" from Pittsburgh to Chicago and stop over in Cincinnati, just because it is on the way, to play or sing, or maybe both. Last week there was a concert every night and two matinees. This week there is one concert.

It may be answered that New York and Chicago has several concerts in one night and no one complains. Quite true; but Cincinnati is not a metropolis and its musical public is limited. A little more care in booking would result in better houses and additional money for the visiting artist, because, try as you will, you cannot drag the "tired business man" or the equally tired "society lady" to a concert every night in the week—and expect them to pay for the privilege.

Pavlowa Dances.

Pavlowa and her company gave two performances last week in Music Hall, appearing Saturday afternoon and Sunday evening. The scenery and costumes were magnificent, the orchestra good, and the little Russian herself the last word in grace and agility.

Local Violinist in Recital.

Florence Hardeman, who studied under Serato and Auer, and returned to America on account of the war, made her debut in this, her native city, last Wednesday night in Memorial Hall. A large audience was present to greet Miss Hardeman, who has excited more than the usual interest in musical circles, and the flowers and applause were all that any young artist could wish. The following program was well selected: Chaconne, by Vitali; Lalo "Symphonie Espagnole"; "Melodie," by Gluck; "La Chasse," Kreisler-Cartier"; "Poeme Elegiaque," Keller; "Chant Negre," Kramer; "Tambourine Chinois," Kreisler, and "Hungarian Airs," Ernst. Miss Hardeman certainly has made good use of her time while in Europe, her broad, noble tone and beautiful legato placing her at once in a class with more mature artists. Her vivacity and fire are temperamental, and joined with these is a nature thoroughly musical. Miss Hardeman had the good fortune to secure as her accompanist Florence Larrabee, of Boston, a fellow student in Berlin, whose exquisite playing added much to the success of the concert. These two young artists expect to tour together this winter and the combination is one well worth hearing, their understanding of their instruments and each other making for a perfect ensemble.

Conservatory Piano Recital.

Leo Paalz's piano recital at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, last Thursday evening, attracted a large audience and won for him much well merited applause. Mr. Paalz devoted the first part of his program to the early seventeenth and eighteenth century writers, in which he proved himself well versed. Much interest was attached to the Haydn arietta and eighteen variations and a closing group of modern Russian compositions. These he presented and imparted to his hearers with particular enthusiasm and consequent success. Mr. Paalz was the recipient of many congratulations at the close of the evening.

Notes

Helen Portune, for a number of years known as one of the most successful young violinists of the city, is now making a name for herself as a singer of decided promise, as indicated by the artistic excellence of her song recital at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music last Wednesday evening. Miss Portune has been devoting herself to the development of her voice under John A. Hoffmann at the conservatory for several years past with highly gratifying results. Her interpretations showed breadth of musical understanding and strong dramatic element. With an eclectic program, comprised of groups of Schubert, Strauss, Debussy, Leighton and Tirindelli, and arias by Mendelssohn and Charpentier, she was able to prove her varied ability and was rewarded with much enthusiastic applause. She was artistically supported at the piano by her talented sister, Grace Portune Kaplun.

The Saturday recital at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music brought out students from the classes of Marcian Thalberg, Pier Adolfo Tirindelli and Lena Palmer, the following participating: Arline Smith, Jack Maish, Louise Garfunkle, Eldon Murray, Robert Schenk, Frieda Besuner and Myra Reed.

Walter Vaughan, the young tenor, who has shown remarkable possibilities in his recent advanced course of instruction, continues in demand for concerts both in and outside of Cincinnati. The latter part of this week he gives a series of recitals in the western part of Pennsylvania, finishing on Sunday afternoon at Fayette City, where he is engaged to sing the memorial service at the Elks' Temple. Those who enjoyed Mr. Vaughan's excellent work in the performances given by the Springer Opera Club of the College of Music will be pleased to learn that he will again be heard with the Springer Club this year.

At the meeting and dinner held by the newly organized New England Society at the Chamber of Commerce, Tuesday evening, a mixed quartet from the College of Music made a favorable impression. The quartet is composed of advanced students of the College and includes Mai Armendt, Lula Bodemann, George Krieger and Paul F. Sebring.

A quartet of well known and efficient young singers from the College of Music will go to Maysville, Ky., next Sunday to sing the memorial service at the Elks' Temple, in that city. The personnel of the quartet will include: Mary Gretchen Morris, soprano; Lula Bodemann, contralto; George Krieger, tenor, and Paul F. Sebring, bass.

Jessie Partlon Tyree.

Elberfeld recently heard "Meistersinger," "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser" and "Freischütz." The prices at the Elberfeld Opera have been reduced and the attendance is satisfactory, several of the performances having been sold out.

Miss Kober Discusses Student Department.

Georgia Kober, pianist and president of the Sherwood Music School, Chicago, Ill., read the following paper recently before the Chicago Musical Club:

"It cannot but be pleasing to any one whose life work, like my own, has been dedicated to the cultivation of the musical art, and its teaching, that such a departure as the Student Department of the Chicago Women's Musical Club should have been conceived and carried out, and that its direction should be placed in my hands. I feel that more competent ones might have been chosen—but may I be allowed to say that no one to whom it might have been intrusted would have approached the work with a deeper or more sincere desire to make a success of it?

"The subject of the Student Department has already been thoroughly discussed by the members of the club, but it will, I hope, continue to engage their warmest interest and heartiest cooperation, in every respect. I say this with particular earnestness because I am so confident that the department, once it is well organized and its work has proceeded to that point where results are becoming apparent, will prove of such value, not only in its more immediate aspects, but others now latent which will develop as the work goes on.

"I think, I am sure, that you are all aware that the primary object of the Student Department is not only to afford the best musical advantages for young girls and women with a serious purpose of adopting music as a vocation, but, most particularly, to create for them the environment so necessary for success in their endeavors. I regret to say that the lines of the feminine music student are not always cast in pleasant places. In many cases she is alone and among strangers; she has been warned to avoid the pitfalls of city life; she has, very possibly, pecuniary resources that are not large; and she lacks initiative and confidence. In consequence she lives a narrow and restricted life, which is inimical to success.

"Music is an exacting mistress—she must be worshipped with whole hearted devotion. But on the part of her devotees she does not wish for a lopsided development of personality or talent. A well rounded personality, a cultivated nature and a rich mental soil, carefully fertilized, she nowadays insists upon. Many of the club members have probably read, for instance, of the enormous amount of time that Paderewski spends at the keyboard, in order to perfect his art; but, at the same time, he is a man of the widest sympathies, the deepest culture and the most polished personality, and it is these characteristics which have been invaluable to him in his work. There has been in the past, I regret to say, no place in the city of Chicago where its hundreds of young women engaged in music study, many of whom are non-residents, could enjoy the advantages so necessary to them. It is one of the chief aims of the Student Department to create such a place. I have in mind what should, in fact, be a sort of 'club within a club,' where these young women should find not only safety and shelter, but that so desirable atmosphere and environment calculated to bring out the best in them and to develop it, to open new vistas into pleasant paths, and to relieve them from the loneliness, the sense of isolation and of over attention to the sole object that goes far, in many cases, to defeat the attainment of that self same end. There is a great work to be done here, and with the hearty cooperation of the entire body of club members it certainly can be accomplished.

"There is another feature, also, upon which I wish to lay some stress. That will be the usefulness of the department to the young matron of musical tastes. The feminine practitioner of the divine art of harmony very often, as you are doubtless well aware, feels a vocation for another profession—that of marriage . . . Do I need to say that clashes are usually fatal to harmony? In these cases they all—too often—are, in the musical sense. The result is that the devotee claimed by matrimony neglects her music—a very sad fact, but a true one! In course of time, also, small clinging arms are apt to come into her life. and they are also apt to come between her and the keyboard. Later on, when George remarks to Mrs. George that she never touches the piano nowadays, and she resolves to return to her old allegiance, she is very likely to strike a few false notes. Sometimes she strikes so many that harmony again suffers and the result is embarrassing to herself and unpleasing to her audience, howsoever indulgent and bound to praise it may be. In such cases as this the Student Department is certain to prove a most welcome resource to the woman who has temporarily given up her music but awakens later on to the fact that her life and that of her family are impoverished without it. It will provide her with the atmosphere, the opportunity for a renewal of musical culture for which she will be most grateful. . . . Nothing is more important than that the young mother should be able to play for her children—and, if she possesses any vocal gifts whatever, to sing to them and for them. . . .

"I could devote myself to many other phases of the department and its possibilities, but the minutes allotted me are limited, and I must be brief. In closing, however, I wish to say that above all things else which it will be my purpose to create within the department is a spirit of helpfulness, fellowship and mutual enjoyment of their work and of each other upon the part of the students. In this way a stimulus is provided that is otherwise unattainable. 'Team work' is just as necessary in such an institution as it is in a baseball club if the highest possible goals are to be reached. It is not the purpose of the department to push a few students up to these altitudes, but to lift the entire body to them—and to do this all must work enthusiastically together. So should the whole club itself work also, in those directions which will assist—and so, I feel sure, will they work.

"What they have been instrumental in accomplishing they need remain in no uncertainty about, for the plans for the Student Department include, among the most prominent, an annual recital, in March, before and for the benefit of the entire club membership—at which time, if all goes well, that they will each and all feel a pardonable pride in what has been achieved cannot, I hope, be for a moment seriously doubted."

Fabbrini Activities.

and will appear in joint recital at Salina with Andrea Sarto.

Mr. Fabbrini is a member of the Minneapolis Trio, which is made up of this distinguished pianist; K. Scheurer, violinist, and Cornelius van Vliet, cellist. Mr. Fabbrini will concertize during the months of January, February and March in the South, Northwest and West.

Hensel in Germany.

Heinrich Hensel, the Wagner tenor, writes to the MUSICAL COURIER from Hamburg: "In this city the war is hardly noticeable; the theatres are packed, and at the Opera, as well as at the various other places of entertainment, matters progress just as in ordinary times."

Hensel has been singing at Hannover, Germany, in "Tannhäuser" and "Siegfried," for the benefit of the wounded soldiers, and in Hamburg he gave a concert for the benefit of the Red Cross which netted 8,000 marks ($2,000).

Max von Pauer gave two piano recitals in Stuttgart a few weeks ago and was the soloist at a Beethoven concert of the Royal Orchestra there.

Florence Hinkle in Middle West.

Seldom have we heard such a delightful voice as Miss Hinkle possesses, a voice of absolute purity and of the rarest timbre. Her exquisite interpretation which was richly enhanced by resourceful technical control, evidenced a thorough artist. Miss Hinkle's French is delightful and she displayed unusual diction in her group of four songs.—Evanston Index, October 24, 1914.

Miss Hinkle's voice is a soprano of rare purity and much charm, and it is used in the skillful manner that at once betokens the routined artist.—Evanston Daily News, October 24, 1914.

It was good to hear in the singing of Florence Hinkle all the rare beauty of voice, all the admirable technical control, all the intelligence and genuinely musical feeling that have heretofore won high praise for her singing. Miss Hinkle has always been noted for her clear enunciation and it proved to be one of her chief charms on last Wednesday evening, and added to this her clarity of tone, the beautiful flexibility of her voice and the power of coloring, it makes one realize the justice in the universal opinion that she holds first rank among the singers of the day.—Battle Creek Enquirer, November 11, 1914.

One of the rarest voices ever heard in Battle Creek was displayed at the Congregational church last evening when Florence Hinkle made her first appearance locally under the auspices of the Symphony Orchestra. Miss Hinkle charmed the most critical of her audience by the wonderful clarity of tone, her splendid technic and her warmth of expression. All her songs were greatly enjoyed and if there were any favorites in the English group, they were an old Irish "Lullaby" and Ward-Stephens' "Summertime," which were greatly appreciated for their own merit and because they led Miss Hinkle into singing the dear old Scotch song, "Comin' Through the Rye."—The Battle Creek Daily Moon, November 11, 1914.

Never has a more satisfactory artist appeared in Battle Creek than Florence Hinkle, soprano. Miss Hinkle possesses that rare combination so seldom found, talent of a high order and at the same time great personal charm.—Battle Creek Daily Journal, November 11, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Hollis Edison Davenny with Pittsburgh Male Chorus.

In the recent performance of Max Bruch's "Frithiof" by the Pittsburgh Male Chorus, Hollis Edison Davenny again was selected to sing the title role. Mr. Davenny appeared in this role with Alice Nielsen for the Male Chorus two years ago, at which time he scored a complete success, the critics being unanimous in their praise of his work. However, in his recent appearance, Mr. Davenny, without question, scored the greatest success of his career. Not only did he receive tremendous ovations from the audience and the chorus after each solo, but, following the concert, was the recipient of a reception seldom accorded any artist. Jennie Irene Mix, the Pittsburgh critic, in speaking of Mr. Davenny's work, said: "Mr. Davenny is the possessor of a beautiful baritone voice of splendid timbre. He scored a decided triumph."

CHICAGO HAS A WEEK FILLED WITH CONCERTS.

Musical Activities Are Paramount in the Middle West Metropolis—Many Events Reviewed in Breezy Paragraphs.

Chicago, Ill., December 12, 1914.

If you give the public what it really wants it will fill any theatre on a rainy, windy Sunday afternoon when times are hard and money scarce. The truth of this remark was demonstrated last Sunday when the inclemency of the elements could not keep home an army of musical admirers who thronged the Auditorium Theatre to its last seat and another legion found its way to chairs placed in the pit of the orchestra and on the stage, where the public was literally packed like the proverbial sardines, ten feet deep for the occasion of hearing anew the ever popular tenor, John McCormack. The famous Irish singer today is among the very few artists whose box office value is incontestable. To pack the Auditorium beyond its capacity with a cosmopolitan audience is sufficient proof that John McCormack gives to the public what it clamors for and as long as he pleases his hearers his hold will be everlasting. The program was made up to interest not only the Irish contingent which flocks to him, but also the musical devotees at large.

The romanza from Mascagni's "Rantzau" opened the recital. The second group, made up of Hugo Wolf's "Secrecy"; "Sylvelin," by Sinding; "The Quiet of the Woods," by Reger, and Rachmaninow's "Oh, Thou Billowy Field," was admirably rendered by the recitalist. The third group, made up exclusively of old Irish songs, was received with rapturous applause and four encores had to be added to the four songs inscribed on the printed program. The last group consisted of "Daybreak," by MacFadyen; Coleridge-Taylor's "You Lay So Still," and the same composer's "Life and Death." "The Cave," from the pen of Edwin Schneider, Mr. McCormack's accompanist, shared with the other compositions in success.

To review the performance seems unnecessary; suffice it to state that the recitalist was at his best, that he thrills his hearers with his sweet, clear voice, that his readings reveal the artist in every phase, that his breath control is, as of yore, phenomenal, and his enunciation a joy to the ear.

Donald McBeath, violinist, the assisting artist, gave a good account of himself in selections by Cottenet, Kreisler, D'Ambrosio, Mozart and Bach, and Mr. Schneider supplied creditable accompaniments for the soloists.

Nicolai Sokoloff's Debut at Illinois Theatre.

On Sunday afternoon, December 6, at the Illinois Theatre, Nikolai Sokoloff made his debut here before a good sized gathering and disclosed in the Handel sonata, D major, for violin, a sure and facile technic, a tone of good quality, and the playing of the first number presaged well for the balance of the program, which included the Lalo "Symphonie Espagnole," Bach "Sarabande Giga," Chausson's "Poeme," op. 25, and "Havanise," by Saint-Saëns. Carol Robinson gave good piano support to the recitalist.

Jennette Loudon and Eda Ohrenstein in Recital.

Last Sunday afternoon, December 6, at Thurber Recital Hall, Jennette Loudon, director of the Jennette Loudon Studios, invited a large gathering to hear Eda D. Ohrenstein, soprano, in a song recital. Miss Loudon was heard in the Schumann "Papillon," op. 2. The balance of the program was given by the singer.

Sébald and Levy in Sonata Evening.

At the Little Theatre, last Monday evening, December 7, the first sonata evening announced by Alexander Sébald, violinist, and Heniot Levy, pianist, took place before a distinguished and musical audience. The program consisted of the Brahms sonata, op. 108, in D minor, the Heniot Levy sonata and the César Franck sonata, A major. Only the Levy sonata was heard by this reviewer. The composition impressed most agreeably and though sandwiched between two classics its place on the program was not obstructive. Mr. Levy's sonata is full of color and melody; besides it was admirably played by both Mr. Sébald and the composer.

Mr. Sébald is a splendid ensemble player and he gave on this occasion of his best and won the full approval of his hearers. Mr. Levy, in conjunction with Mr. Sébald, played his composition beautifully and the blending and perfect ensemble of the two artists gave great pleasure and was in no small way responsible for the good effect obtained all through the reading of the sonata. The second sonata evening to be given by the same artists will take place on Tuesday, January 26.

Recital at the Fine Arts Theatre.

A program of songs was given at the Fine Arts Theatre on Sunday afternoon by Willard Flint, basso cantante, assisted by Jessie Mack Hamilton, soprano, under the direction of Ernest Briggs. Mr. Flint is a well known oratorio soloist, having had great success with the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston. It was in this capacity that his work was most thoroughly appreciated on Sunday afternoon. The Handel aria, "O Ruddier Than the Cherry," with which he began the program, showed Mr. Flint to be the possessor of a voice, rich, sympathetic, flexible and strong. In his second group the Lehmann "Mad Dog" was greatly enjoyed. Not only did Mr. Flint render the music capably, but also every word of Goldsmith's humorous verse was easily understood. This excellent enunciation characterized all of Mr. Flint's work. Mrs. Hamilton opened with a group of French songs capably sung. Her voice is at its best in pianissimo passages, making effective the rendition of Ronald's "Winter." Grace M. Keesler proved an able accompanist.

Mendelssohn Club's First Concert.

The first concert of the season by the Chicago Mendelssohn Club will take place at Orchestra Hall next Thursday evening, December 17. Albert Lindquest, tenor, will be the soloist and will sing, among other numbers, "As I Await," from the pen of the Chicago composer Arthur Dunham.

Albert Spalding in Recital.

The University Orchestral Association of the University of Chicago announces a violin recital by Albert Spalding to be given at Leon Mandel Hall next Tuesday afternoon, December 15. An interesting program has been arranged, which includes among others the sonata in G for piano and violin by the Chicago composer, John Alden Carpenter, which Mr. Spalding will play with his accompanist, Andrea Benoist.

Spry Interpretation Class.

Last Wednesday morning, December 9, a representative of the Musical Courier called at the Spry Music School, in the Fine Arts Building, to be present at one of the interpretation classes, which was being given by Walter Spry. Reaching the school at a somewhat too early hour, the representative was taken into the harmony class, which is directed by Cedric Wilmot Lemont. The class was having an examination, and therefore the visitor did not venture to ask any questions directly of the pupils, but learned much through a twenty minute conversation with Mr. Lemont as to his method of teaching harmony. "Practical harmony is what I teach," said Mr. Lemont, "and counterpoint is only taught to pupils desirous of becoming composers or who intend to make teaching their profession. Of course, when we get talented pupils wishing to learn counterpoint we give them instruction, but the majority of the students are not included in that class."

The Walter Spry School teaches the Faelten system, which the writer thought somewhat complicated until Mr. Lemont gave him a very good example, stating, "If you did not know Greek characters and were to be given an English story written in Greek letters you would not understand it unless you knew the symbols, but as soon as you knew the characters it would appeal to you to be as easy as could be. The same with the Faelten method, with which I have always obtained the best success and which I consider the easiest to memorize."

The writer, however, did not go to the school for the purpose of taking a lesson in harmony, but to be present at the program given before the interpretation class by Mr. Spry. Being ushered into the room of the director, who was then finishing his history of music class, the writer was given half an hour's enjoyment listening to the distinguished pianist's performance of the Mendelssohn variation serieuses, op. 54, one of John Field's five nocturnes, Hans Seeling's left hand study "Lorelei" and Liszt's fantasie on "Rigoletto." Mr. Spry was applauded to the echo by his large and enthusiastic class. Previous to playing each number Mr. Spry gave an interesting little talk and related several anecdotes. Starting with next week James Whittaker will also give programs before the interpretation class.

Gunn-Spencer Two-Piano Recital.

Allen Spencer and Glenn Dillard Gunn will give a two-piano recital in the Fine Arts Theatre next Sunday afternoon, December 20. They will be assisted by Marion Green, bass. This is to be a most interesting and uncommon recital. It is seldom that the public is permitted to hear two such well known pianists in two-piano works. The program is new and some of the works will have their first hearings in Chicago at that time. Mr. Green will also have a number of novelties to offer.

Chicago Composer's Opera to Be Given.

Mrs. Alfred B. Andrews, a Chicago composer, has written a one act opera, "Guido Ferrata," the production of which is being seriously considered by the Century Opera Company during its stay in Chicago. The two characters are Beatrice and Guido. The part of Beatrice will be taken by the well known Chicago soprano, Hazel Eden (Mudge), student, of Herman Devries for the last three years, and the role of Guido, by Worthe Faulkner. Both artists are rehearsing their parts with the composer and with Mr. Devries.

Luella Chilson Ohrman's Annual Recital.

At the Fine Arts Theatre, on Sunday evening, December 6, Luella Chilson Ohrman gave her annual song recital, under the direction of Carl D. Kinsey. Mrs. Ohrman had arranged an interesting and well balanced program.

MacBurney Series of Song Recitals.

Under the auspices of the South Park Commissioners the fifth program of the MacBurney series of song recitals took place at the Hamilton Park field house on Monday evening, December 7. Ethel Geistweit Benedict, soprano, furnished the program. The next program of the series will be presented on December 21 by Fred H. Huntley, baritone, assisted by a male octet. The program will be sung entirely in English.

Clarence Whitehill to Sing in "Messiah."

Clarence Whitehill, of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, will sing the bass solo role of Handel's "Messiah" with the Apollo Musical Club, Friday night, December 25, and Sunday afternoon, December 27, at the Auditorium Theatre. The immense chorus of 1,000 singers has been rehearsing under Mr. Wild, conductor, for a number of weeks past, and surprising results have been obtained in the handling of such a large number of singers. The entire Chicago Symphony Orchestra will furnish the accompaniments at both concerts.

Reuter Pupils in Two Recitals.

Several pupils of Rudolph Reuter were presented at the Ziegfeld Theatre last Saturday morning, and gave an unusually interesting program, which included the Carpenter violin and piano sonata and the MacDowell concerto in A minor. They were Vera Bowen, Florence Bettray, and Messrs. Carré, Dieter and Gabriel. On Wednesday evening, December 16, at 8 o'clock, a second recital will be given in the Ziegfeld Recital Hall by the Misses Baker, Patterson, Rebeil, Bargman, and Messrs. Mannheimer and Dieter. Bernard Dieter is one of the most promising of Chicago's younger composers, and on this occasion he will play his own first rhapsody, in G minor. He is a pupil of Adolf Brune in composition.

Rudolph Reuter's Vacation.

Rudolph Reuter, the pianist, will spend his Christmas holidays in Washington, D. C., as guest of Col. Charles Page Bryan, former Ambassador to Japan during the Taft administration. Their friendship dates from the time of Mr. Reuter's musical activities in the Orient, when he was for four years professor at the Imperial Academy at Tokyo. During Col. Bryan's ambassadorship he resided at the American Embassy, and was informally dubbed its "Musically Attache." Mr. Reuter will also pay New York a short visit.

American Conservatory Notes.

The last public recital of the American Conservatory for the year 1914 took place Saturday afternoon, December 12, at Kimball Hall. The program was presented by Stella Roberts, Thelma Olms, Mabel Stapleton, Florence Hermann, Jessie Green and Edward Kline, all members of Herbert Butler's ensemble class. A suite for two violins and piano, four pieces for four violins and piano by Bohm, and the piano quartet, op. 47, by Schumann, made up the program, which was given by the young people in a manner which showed a thorough training in solid musicianship. The annual Christmas vacation of the American Conservatory will begin Thursday, December 24, and end Saturday, January 2, 1915.

Weidig's Symphonic Suite.

Adolf Weidig's symphonic suite in three movements will receive its first performance in Chicago at the regular concerts of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on December 18 and 19.

Albert Spalding Soloist with Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

At the regular pair of concerts given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra last Friday afternoon, December 11, and Saturdy evening, December 12, Albert Spalding, the American violinist who boasts Chicago as his home, was the soloist. Mr. Spalding, who had not been heard in these surroundings for the last three years, made his reappearance in the Mendelssohn violin concerto, in which he won an overwhelming success. Mr. Spalding spent the last three years concertizing in the various European countries and his stay abroad has been greatly beneficial, as he returned a more mature artist. His style has broadened and he plays with absolute surety. His tone is of great beauty and his technic impeccable; his reading was all that could be desired and his playing deserved the tumultuous plaudits which echoed through the hall at the conclusion of the number.

The orchestral numbers included two nocturnes by Claude Debussy, "Nuages" and "Fetes," which on this occasion had their first hearing in Chicago. Another new composition was presented to the patrons of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with the first hearing in Chicago of the Charles Martin Loeffler "La Mort de Tintagiles." Both novelties impressed only moderately, though played admirably by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under the superb command of its leader, Frederick Stock.

Violet Bourne in Recital.

At the Bush Conservatory Recital Hall, Violet Bourne, advertised as "the wonderful child pianist," a pupil of Julie Rive-King, appeared in a piano recital last Friday evening, December 11. Miss Bourne was assisted by Claire Hart, tenor, and Ine Klinefelter, accompanist. Review of this recital is deferred until next week.

Herman Devries Brings Out Work by Chicago Composer.

At the beginning of the week the Herman Devries Studios informed this department that "Guido Ferrata," music by the Chicago composer, Mrs. Alfred B. Andrews, was being rehearsed daily by the composer and Mr. Devries in his studios in the Fine Arts Building and that the management of the Century Opera Company was seriously considering the work. Since then the Messrs. Aborn decided to present the opera on Tuesday evening, December 29, at the Auditorium Theatre. Hazel Eden Mudge, for the last three years student of Mr. Devries, will sing the part of Beatrice and the part of Guido will be sung by Worthe Faulkner, who has rehearsed his part with the composer and Mr. Devries for the last few weeks in the latter's studios. It might be said that Jacques Coini, the artistic stage director of the Century Opera Company, was in a great measure responsible for the opera being taken over by the Messrs. Aborn. Calling at the Herman Devries Studios, Mr. Coini was introduced to the composer and to the interpreters of the new work and was asked by Mr. Devries if he would be willing to spend half an hour of his time to hear the composition. Mr. Coini was so much impressed that he at once suggested an interview between the composer and the Messrs. Aborn, and it was then and there understood that the interpreters would be those heard at the audition referred to above.

THE AEOLIAN CO., 32, AVENUE DE L'OPERA

Impromptu Musicale at Oberndorfer Studio.

The Musical Courier representative was invited last Friday afternoon to a private musicale given in the Marx Oberndorfer studios, Fine Arts Building. Rolf Hammer, the Norwegian tenor, who was to appear in Wagnerian roles with the Chicago Grand Opera Company, sang a group of Norwegian songs and the "Farewell," from "Lohengrin," revealing a voice of beauty and large volume. Signor Carpio, an Italian tenor, was heard in an aria from "Andrea Chenier" and one from "La Boheme," both well sung. Marx Oberndorfer at the piano, as ever, played most artistic accompaniments for the singers.

Worthe Faulkner Chosen for Opera Premiere.

Worthe Faulkner, one of the leading tenors of Chicago, has been given a signal honor in being selected to sing the title role of a new American opera, written by Mrs. Alfred Andrews, which is to be presented by the Century Opera Company on December 29. Mr. Faulkner has studied during the past three years with Thomas N. MacBurney, whose growing list of artists attests his authority on voice.

GRAND OPERA IN CHICAGO.

Century Opera Company Continues to Give Satisfactory Performance.

"Jewels of the Madonna," December 7.

The third week of grand opera in English by the Century Grand Opera Company was ushered in by a splendid performance of the "Jewels of the Madonna," given for the first time in Chicago in English. Helen Stanley, formerly a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, was entrusted with the title role, in which she scored heavily. Miss Stanley has grown considerably in her art since she last was heard here in opera, and her conception of the role was original, while her singing of the part was praiseworthy in every respect. Miss Stanley's success was emphatic and she was the bright star of the night. Gustav Bergman voiced well the part of Gennaro, and shared the success with the soprano. Louis Kreidler as Rafaelc portrayed the part brilliantly and with much originality, his conception of it differing greatly from other interpreters we have seen here. Kathleen Howard, a most reliable singer, is the best Carmela ever heard at the Auditorium, and she disclosed her rich, velvety voice to fine advantage in the duet in the first act with Gennaro. The other roles were in capable hands, and the only drawback in the ensemble was the chorus, which, especially in the first act, sang off pitch invariably. The orchestra, under Joseph Pasternack, though small in number, gave too much volume, especially the brasses, which were allowed at times completely to cover the voices of the singers.

"The Jewels of the Madonna" was given, as stated above, in English. It was better understood when sung in Italian.

"Tales of Hoffmann," December 8.

In the "Tales of Hoffmann" on Tuesday night Florence Macbeth made a lively little doll and added to the part with her sweet, velvety voice, winning much success after her aria. Kathleen Howard's portrayal of Niclaus was a treat to the eye and her singing most agreeable to the ear. After the second act Howard Shelley, the press agent of the company, made an announcement from the stage that owing to the illness of Bettina Freeman, Lois Ewell would sing the role of Giulietta as well as Antonia, the latter being the only part for which she was billed. Miss Ewell suffered from a cold, and Orville Harrold, who was the Hoffmann, also was handicapped by a catarrhal disorder. Graham Marr, in the triple part of Coppelius, Dapertutto and Miracle, shared in the honors of the evening, even though in the part of Coppelius his makeup and acting left much to be desired. The orchestra, under Josia Zuro, gave a good account of itself, and the stage management was adequate.

"Jewels of the Madonna," December 9 (Matinee).

"The Jewels" was repeated with the same cast heard on Monday night, with the exception of Santley, who replaced Kathleen Howard as the mother.

"Romeo and Juliet," December 9 (Evening).

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the Auditorium Theatre was celebrated with a performance of "Romeo and Juliet" on Wednesday evening, with Lois Ewell as Juliet and Orville Harrold as Romeo. Miss Ewell sang agreeably, even though her rendition of the Waltz song did not carry with it much bravura. Mr. Harrold was a sobbing lover. Henry Weldon was a most satisfying Friar, which part he imbued with his big generous basso voice, winning the lion's share in the success of the evening. Thomas Chalmers was a well voiced Mercutio; not so Alfred Kaufmann, who as Capulet was the black spot in the good ensemble of the performance. Elizabeth Campbell made up a good looking page, and the minor roles were in capable hands. Josiah Zuro conducted.

"Jewels of the Madonna," December 10.

On Thursday evening the "Jewels of the Madonna" was again repeated.

"Lohengrin," December 11.

The first performance of "Lohengrin" by the Century Opera Company was given on Friday evening, with Bettina Freeman as Elsa, Kathleen Howard as Ortrud, Morgan Kingston as Lohengrin, Louis Kreidler as Telramund, Henry Weldon as the King, and Graham Marr as the Herald. Zuro conducted.

"Tales of Hoffmann," December 12 (Matinee).

The "Tales of Hoffmann" was repeated with the same cast heard at previous performances.

"Jewels of the Madonna," December 12 (Evening).

In the evening "The Jewels of the Madonna" was the bill.

Beethoven Society Musicale.

New York's newly organized Beethoven Society, now numbering about 300 members, met in the Astor Gallery, Waldorf-Astoria, on Saturday afternoon, December 12, for its second musicale.

Delos Becker, tenor; Katherine Lurch, contralto, and the American String Quartet (Gertrude Marshall, first violin; Ruth Stickney, second violin; Adeline Packard, viola, and Susan Lord Brandagee, violoncello), furnished the program.

Mr. Becker sang the "Siegmund Love Song" (Wagner), Gena Branscombe's "Hail Ye Time of Holydays" and Walter Morse Rummel's "Ecstasy." Although the Beethoven ladies applauded insistently, Mr. Becker did not respond to encores.

Katherine Lurch, a member of the Beethoven chorus, was heard in the Franz "Aus meinen grossen schmerzen," "Aufenthalt," Schubert; Cadman's "I Hear a Thrush at Eve"; Campbell-Tipton's "A Spirit Flower," and Whelpley's "The Nightingale Has a Lyre of Gold." Her voice is of good range and quality and she uses it well.

The string quartet furnished Beethoven's C minor quartet. op. 18, No. 4, and Gliere's Theme and Variations.

Susan Lord Brandagee gave the Arensky "Chanson Triste," accompanied by two violins and viola, effectively.

Three duos for two violins and piano, Godard, were furnished by Gertrude Marshall, Ruth Stickney and Adeline Packard.

Arthur Clyde Leonard was the accompanist.

This program furnished, as the president of the club, Mrs. James Daniel Mortimer, announced, by made-in-America musicians, proved thoroughly enjoyable throughout.

DETROIT'S IMPORTANT EVENTS.

Detroit, Mich., December 9, 1914.

Monday evening, November 30, the DeVoe-Kelsey management presented Alma Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist in a joint recital for the third concert in its Philharmonic course. This occurred in the Light Guard Armory before a large and enthusiastic audience; in fact the enthusiasm reached such a pitch that the program bade fair to last until morning, for the audience was almost insatiable in its demands for encores.

Alma Gluck always is a great favorite in Detroit, and her work that evening charmed as usual; one of the most delightful of her numbers was a group of folksongs of seven different nations. Mr. Zimbalist opened the program with the Handel sonata in E major. His playing throughout the evening was most satisfying, both in refinement of tone and sympathetic interpretation. The accompanists of the evening were Wilhelm Spoor for Mme. Gluck and Sam Chotzinoff for Mr. Zimbalist.

Olga Samaroff with Philadelphia Orchestra.

Tuesday evening, December 1, at the Light Guard Armory, the Orchestral Association presented the Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski conductor, with Olga Samaroff as assisting artist. The orchestra played symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73, and the Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, by Liszt. The work of the Philadelphia Orchestra always is provocative of enthusiasm, and at the close of the symphony, not only was the conductor recalled many times, but the entire orchestra acknowledged the prolonged and sincere applause. Mme. Samaroff played the Tschaikowsky concerto in B flat minor and played it superbly. In her previous appearances here, she proved herself a great artist, but even so, her work Monday evening showed that she had not stood still in the intervening time. Her playing shows more virility without the sacrifice of any of the delicacy that characterized her work. At the close of her number she was recalled so many times that one lost count, while the floral offerings were remarkable for number and beauty.

Third Concert of the Tuesday Musicale.

The third morning concert of the Tuesday Musicale was given in the Westminster Church, Tuesday, December 1, for members and guests. Minnie Caldwell and Winifred Ada Whitely played groups of organ numbers. The Chaminade Quartet, Mrs. Charles Sheldon, Mrs. Benjamin F. Mulford, sopranos; Mrs. Charles A. Parker and Jennie M. Stoddard, contraltos, sang a group of Christmas numbers, and the chorus under the direction of Mrs. Charles Clements sang a Christmas cantata by Franz Abt. Incidental solos were sung by Dorothy Rauth and Clara George, and incidental readings were given by Maud Ralston. Mrs. Samuel G. Mumford was the accompanist.

Red Cross Concerts.

Two concerts under the auspices of the Red Cross Society have been planned. One was given in the Jefferson Avenue Presbyterian Church, Thursday evening, December 3. Gustin Wright, organist, late of Paris, gave the program, assisted by Hildegarde Brandegee, violinist; Helen Burr Brand, harpist; Bessie Booth Dodge, soprano, and William Lavin, tenor. The second concert will occur Thursday, December 10, in the Unitarian Church, at which time Mr. Wright will have the assistance of Meta Goebel Owen, soprano; May Legget-Abel, violinist, and William Lavin, tenor.

Lecture by Weston Gales.

Tuesday morning, December 8, in the Century Building the members of the Tuesday Musicale were given an interesting and illuminating talk on the orchestra by Weston Gales, conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra. At the close of the lecture an opportunity was given for questions, of which privilege many availed themselves. Mr. Gales talks well and one listens with pleasure and profit.

Jennie M. Stoddard.

Organ Vibrations.

An organ stop which emits a note one full octave below any that has ever been heard before has been installed in an organ at Lowell, Mass. This stop is 128 feet long and its note is musically indicated as CCCCCC.

To understand what this means, says the Scientific American, it may be said that a 32-foot pipe vibrates sixteen times a second at its lowest note (CCCC) and this is very near the point below which vibrations cease to form a continuous sound, while a 128-foot pipe vibrates but four times a second when producing its lowest sound. It was found, however, that a group of pipes giving overtones could be arranged to produce, when sounded together, a synthetic tone, and by this means stops producing the effect of a 64-foot pipe have been built without requiring the use of a pipe of that length; and now in the same way this monster 128-foot stop has appeared, which is described as "a mighty atmospheric throb of most awesome majesty." Indeed, it would seem that its tones must be rather felt than heard.

Samoiloff Pupils Sing.

December 9, pupils of L. S. Samoiloff united in a recital at Carnegie Chamber Music Hall, New York. Miss Barondess, daughter of School Commissioner Joseph Barondess, sang "Love's Epitome," by Salter, with fine voice and excellent expression. Miss Barondess is one of the professional pupils of Mr. Samoiloff. She made a very successful debut with the Zuro Grand Opera Company and also with the National Grand Opera Company, as Santuzza and as Marguerite. Her voice is much larger and clearer than it was last year, and she sang very artistically.

Thomas L. Allen, lyric tenor, sang the aria from "La Boheme" with real operatic style, and showed a voice of volume and beautiful quality. His high C was as easy and bright as the middle tones, and his pronunciation was distinct. Harry Hepner, the tenor, sang the "Carmen" and "Tosca" arias with artistic feeling and excellent interpretation.

The duo from "Norma" was sung exceptionally well by two very young ladies, Miss D. Spinner and Miss E. Jacobs, one seventeen, the other eighteen years of age. The first has a very high, light soprano voice, the other a real dramatic soprano, of rich quality, which makes many listeners think her voice is contralto. Her highest tones, C and D, are as rich as the lowest tones. Miss Jacobs sang with style and expression "Mattinata," by Leoncavallo, and "Allerseelen," by Strauss.

Mrs. Constantineau helped in the success of the duo from "Cavalleria" by singing Santuzza with temperament and power. She wrote Mr. Samoiloff that her voice was entirely ruined, and that he had restored it.

Miss Haft and Miss Bailey possess beautiful lyric soprano organs. They sang with style and expression. Miss Haft sang "The Birthday" with fine quality of voice and much understanding. Her voice, like that of Miss Bailey, is very promising. Miss Bailey sang the "Lullaby," by Gretchaninoff, so sweetly and gracefully that the public wanted her to repeat it. Miss N. Vizetelly has been heard before in Samoiloff concerts. Her voice is a dramatic soprano, true to pitch and very rich. She sang "Down in the Forest" very nicely and interpreted "Because" artistically. Her voice, too, has improved. Two beautiful songs by Gilberté were sung by Mrs. Watson in a voice of great powers and exceptional beauty. Her manner and phrasing showed her to be a singer of experience and talent. Miss Illoway sang two songs by Bond with expression and beauty of tone. Miss Hebron is the possessor of a very excellent lyric soprano voice. She is a new pupil, and considering the short time she has studied, sang exceptionally well the "Ave Maria," by Gounod, and the "Prayer," from "Tosca." Like the others she looked well, having poise and tact.

As closing number the duet from "Faust" was sung by Mr. Hepner and Miss Barondess. The hall was filled, and the pupils were applauded liberally. The platform looked like a flower garden, so many floral gifts were handed to the artists.

Illinois Chaminade Club.

Jacksonville, Ill., has a Chaminade Music Club, organized February 10, 1896, and federated March 17, 1911. For the October 19 meeting "Tone Pictures," with songs by English composers, was the program subject; November 2, "The Sonata," songs by Hugo Wolf and Richard Strauss; November 16, "The Symphony," songs by German composers; November 30, "The Poets in Music"; December 14, overtures and ballet music, songs from operas. Beginning January 4, "Grand Opera" will be the subject, with Victrola illustrations; January 18, modern Russian composers; February 1, "The Symphonic Poem," songs by French composers; February 15, modern French composers; March 1, music of many nations; March 15, open meeting; March 29, "Music in America"; April 12, "Music in America, Opera"; April 26, "Music in America, Oratorio and Sacred Cantata"; May 10, "Music in America, Women Composers."

The officers of the society are: President, Mrs. J. P. Brown; vice-president, Mrs. Robert L. Still; recording secretary, Cora Gordon Graham; corresponding secretary and librarian, Virginia Vasey; treasurer, Sarah Walker.

Mrs. Frank King Clark's Recital.

Mrs. Frank King Clark was heard in recital at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Tuesday afternoon, December 8, assisted by Kurt Schindler at the piano. Her program consisted of a group from the olden time, a group of Schumann songs, four songs from modern French and Russian composers, and a set of songs in English. Her success began with her opening number and increased steadily throughout the recital. The beauty of Mrs. King Clark's voice was at once recognized, and, as the various numbers gave opportunity for the display of her versatile powers of expression, it became manifest that she was a truly great artist. She possesses a voice of exquisite purity and warmth and controls it with rare skill. Her emission and enunciation are faultless, and above all things it is evident that every note and every phrase is carefully rehearsed and prepared so that nothing is left to chance, as in true art it never should be.

In the first group Mrs. King Clark's singing of "Willow, Willow," by Percy Grainger, was particularly noticeable, and this song was evidently much to the taste of the audience. The Schumann songs, "Du bist wie eine Blume," "Der Nussbaum," "Jemand" and "Widmung," were sung with much depth and intensity of feeling, and especially in "Der Nussbaum" Mrs. King Clark's musicianship and interpretative powers were brought into play. In the following group Tschaikowsky's "Pendant le bal" was perhaps the most successful both because of the beauty of the song itself and the delightful delicacy of the interpretation given it by the singer; and the pathetic quality of her voice was wonderfully brought out in the final song of this group, "Triste est le Steppe," by Gretchaninow. The English songs included "Kissing Her Hair," by Schindler, and "We Two Together," by Kernochan, both of which evidently pleased the audience greatly. This recital was an undeniable success.

A de Bernyz Musicale.

Talented pupils of Bertrand de Bernyz appeared in an informal musical program at Hotel Majestic, New York, Wednesday evening, December 9. These were: Mrs. A. Kirch, soprano; Matilda Oberd, soprano; M. E. Corcoran, contralto, and Reynolds Whitney, basso. Thoughtfulness and care in tone production accompanied their singing of operatic arias and German and English songs.

Mr. de Bernyz is at the head of the Bertrand de Bernyz Opera, Concert and Oratorio Society of New York.

"I have heard more promising voices in the short period of my teaching in America than in the twenty years I

Louisa M. Hopkins in Spring Recitals.

That Louisa M. Hopkins, the Philadelphia pianist, will be heard in a number of spring concerts and recitals will undoubtedly prove welcome news to her many friends and admirers.

Among the past successes of this sterling artist are two appearances as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one in the season of 1911 under Max Fiedler, and one last year with Dr. Muck conducting. Miss Hopkins is under the management of G. Dexter Richardson, New York.

Hochstein-Ebell Recital.

David Hochstein, the young American violinist, has been well received at his many concert appearances this season. New York will again have an opportunity to hear this artist on January 15, when he will play in a joint recital with the Russian pianist, Hans Ebell, at Aeolian Hall. Mr. Hochstein has been associated previously with the Russian artist in an extensive joint tour of Germany and England, and, judging from the brilliant reception these musicians had abroad, their appearance together in a New York recital will doubtless prove an interesting event in the present music season.

Wolle Plays Inaugural Recital.

On Tuesday, December 15, Dr. J. Fred. Wolle gave the inaugural organ recital on the large three manual instrument being erected in Zion's Evangelical Lutheran Church, Lancaster, Pa.

PITTSBURGH ACTIVITIES.

Pittsburgh, Pa., December 10, 1914.

On November 20 the last recital of the Art Society was given in Carnegie Music Hall, the artists presented being Helen Stanley, soprano, and Theodore Harrison, baritone. This is the second pair of artists, newcomers to Pittsburgh, to appear for the Art Society this season, the other two being Gittleson and Friedberg. On this occasion both artists made splendid impressions. Miss Stanley displayed one of the most beautiful voices heard in this city in several years. While her style is decidedly operatic, her concert singing is really beyond criticism, much of which is due to a pleasing personality. Miss Stanley will undoubtedly be heard here again in the near future. Mr. Harrison is a serious singer with a splendid voice, which he uses to the best advantage. He is more of the oratorio and recital type, and the contrast made the recital the more enjoyable. His interpretations were musicianly and his work as a whole very satisfying.

Mozart Club in "Cinderella."

The first program of the Mozart Club, Mr. McCollum, director, was given in Carnegie Music Hall, Friday evening, November 27. "Cinderella" (Hoffman) was the work presented. It proved to be one of the best concerts the club has given in recent years. The work is pleasing and was given a satisfactory rendition. The assisting orchestra was much better than usual, which added greatly to the enjoyment of the work. One of the features of the evening was the appearance of Vera Kaighn, the new soprano of the First Presbyterian Church and a newcomer to Pittsburgh. Miss Kaighn possesses a dramatic voice of splendid timbre, and her portrayal of Cinderella was good, especially when the large amount of pianissimo work throughout the part is considered. She is a decided addition to Pittsburgh music circles. Charles Granville, who took the part of the King, is a finished singer. He uses his voice at all times to the best advantage and his stage presence is all that could be desired. Christine Schultz, who took the part of the Queen, possesses a contralto voice of great depth and richness of quality. With such an equipment, she should do splendid things. The choral work, with the exception of a few attacks, was good.

Pittsburgh Male Chorus Concert.

Pittsburgh's Male Chorus gave its first concert of the season in Carnegie Music Hall, December 4. Mr. Martin prepared a program of interest, and in addition this was the occasion of the rendition and identity of the prize composition being presented. The program was known as a Pittsburgh program, the prize composition being named "Hymn to Pittsburgh" and the prize of $100 was won by Harvey Gaul, the Pittsburgh organist and composer. The composition was one of great merit and possibly one of the most difficult numbers the chorus has ever attempted. On account of the late arrival from the press the composition was not given the time in rehearsal that it deserved.

The soloist of the evening was Sophia Kassimir, the former Pittsburgh soprano, who has but recently returned from Europe, where she has been studying for the past few years. Miss Kassimir sang two arias, one number with the chorus and the part of Ingeborg in Bruch's "Frithiof," of which work Hollis Edison Davenny sang the title role. Miss Kassimir displayed a voice of beauty and received an ovation on each appearance. Following her first group she received several large bouquets of roses and chrysanthemums. It was an unusual opportunity for Miss Kassimir to make her first appearance in her home city with such an organization as the Pittsburgh Male Chorus, and without question she made the best of her opportunity. The street song from Herbert's opera, "Naughty Marietta," gave her the best opportunity, and she rose to the occasion. The number had to be repeated before the applause would subside. The other soloists of the evening were Edward Vaughn and Thomas Morris, Jr. The latter has a voice of splendid timbre, which he used to the best advantage in the "Song of the Camp." The chorus sang up to its usual standard.

The work of Mr. Edwards, at the piano, and Mr. Fleer, at the organ, was admirable and did much to support the soloists and the chorus in the difficult numbers.

"The College Hero."

During the week of November 30 "The College Hero" practically held the attention of Pittsburgh, not only because the proceeds were to be given to a charitable institution, but because the principals were well known students of Pittsburgh vocal teachers. The cast included 700 of Pittsburgh's best. It proved to be not only a musical comedy of merit, but a most elaborate production. The choruses were splendidly drilled, both in singing and dancing. The part of the Wizard was taken by Richard Knotts, one of Pittsburgh's prominent vocal teachers. He not only sang his part splendidly, but acted it to perfection. Mr. Cassidy, who took the part of Billiken, was a student of Geraldine Damon, as was also Mrs. Sherman, who took the part of Madame Dashington. Miss Merrick, who took the part of Jessie, has studied with both Frank Milton Hunter and Carl Bernthaler, of this city. Miss Brace, as Elsie, is a pupil of Carlo Minetti. Kathleen Wood Neel, in the part of Mme. Maxwell, studies with C. S. Niesen and piano with William Oetting. Mr. Langenheim, as Ki-Ki, also studied with C. S. Niesen. Portia Keefer, who took one of the leading parts, is a pupil of James Stephen Martin. That "The College Hero" was a success is evidenced by the fact that almost $12,000 was cleared for charity.

Mendelssohn Choir.

Friday evening, December 11, the first and also the last concert of the Mendelssohn Male Choir, of Pittsburgh, was presented in Carnegie Music Hall. May Muckle, cellist, assisted. Mr. Lunt, the director, prepared a program of merit and the chorus rendered the numbers with precision and well distributed tone. While this is the last concert of the chorus it means only that the chorus is to be merged into a mixed chorus for the next concert, which is certainly a commendable move. Not that we wish to lose the Male Choir, for it was a splendid organization, but the city is already supporting three male organizations to only one mixed chorus, which means a more equal division of choral organizations, more competition and consequently better programs. Mr. Lunt has organized a ladies' chorus recently, which is composed of practically all the best ladies' voices in the city, or at least a great portion of the best church singers, and after Christmas the organizations will be joined and form what should be a most splendid chorus.

Hollis Edison Davenny.

Elsa Lyon Heard in Concert.

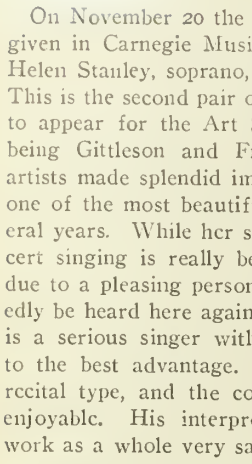
Elsa Lyon, the dramatic mezzo soprano, who has recently returned to the United States after a successful European career, among her engagements having been an appearance at the Wagner Festspiel in Berlin last summer, gave a recital on December 3, at Newark, Ohio. Miss Lyon opened her program with the "Warning Cry" of Brangaene, from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." This, with a group of songs by Brahms and one in English, together with two arias, made up her program, which was much enjoyed by a large number of music lovers.

ELSA LYON,
As Amneris in "Aida."

In addition to the many concert engagements which Miss Lyon is called upon to fill, she is accepting a limited number of pupils, who are doing excellent work under her guidance. Among these pupils should be mentioned Edna Wise, who has been studying two years with Miss Lyon, having been with the latter while abroad. Miss Wise is beginning to give salon recitals and shows promise of a beautiful coloratura voice.

For six years Miss Lyon studied the Lamperti-Moratti method, which she uses in her teaching.

Belle Gottschalk's Engagements.



Belle Gottschalk, the young American soprano who returned recently from Europe, is one of the busiest of the younger class of singers. She has already sung at Westminster College, New Wilmington, Pa., and on January 19 she will be heard with the Lehigh Valley Symphony Orchestra, a new musical organization that is making noteworthy progress. The Easton Symphony Orchestra will have Miss Gottschalk as its soloist on March 4. A number of engagements in and about New York have been secured for her.

Miss Gottschalk was forced to give up a number of European engagements on account of the war, so her American tour had to be arranged in haste. Her home is Westfield, N. J., and she was well known in New Jersey music circles before going to Europe. She is also a graduate of Mt. Holyoke College. Her teachers abroad were Etelka Gerster and the late Frank King Clark.

Among the younger American singers Miss Gottschalk has accomplished a great deal, especially in the operatic field. She has sung such roles as Micaela in "Carmen," Nedda in "Pagliacci" and Mimi in "La Boheme."

Architect—Now don't you think it would be well to have a pergola attached to the west side of the house?

Newlyrich—On the west side of the house? I guess not. I want that there pergola right in the parlor, and I don't want it attached to nothin'. Put it on wheels so the servants kin slide it out of the way when the guests are through playin' on it and want to tango.—Puck.

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Schwarz Organ Recital—Dr. Richardson at Convention—Rechlin Dates—Mrs. de Moss for Five Concerts—Sorrentino Heard From—New Assembly Concert—Becker Pupils Play—Nichols' Joint Recitals—Fisk Agency Announces Choir Bureau—Mrs. Boice Recital Tonight—Scholarship Voice Trial—Anna Rosenberg Plays—Adela Bowne in Italy—Music at the Strand—Notes.

Moritz E. Schwarz, assisted by Fred B. King, clarinet soloist, and William B. Murray, Jr., bell ringer of Trinity Church, gave his regular Wednesday noon recital at Trinity Church, December 9, this being one of the series of recitals under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists. Mr. Schwarz playcd a program of seven numbers, four of them by Americans, Mabel H. McDuffee, Ralph Kinder, Frank Frysinger, and himself. A novelty was Frank Frysinger's "Eventide," during which the bells in the church tower were played by Mr. Murray. These could hardly be heard from the body of the church, however. The clarinet numbers, consisting of "The Swan," by Saint-Saëns, and "Ave Maria," by Hauptmann, helped to make the program interesting. Mr. Schwarz's composition, which he calls "A Carol," is music of life and animation throughout. The following verse is quoted as the motto of this composition:

> The Shepherd tun'd his reed; sweet Philomel
> Essayed, and oft essay'd to catch the strain,
> And treasuring, as on her ear they fell,
> The numbers, echo'd note for note again.

Dr. Richardson at Coming Convention.

Dr. A. Madeley Richardson has consented to deliver an address on Church Music at the Convention of the American Guild of Organists, Columbia University, December 29. Dr. Richardson's new book, "The Choirtrainer's Art," has just been issued by Schirmer, and is attracting a good deal of attention. It is practically a description of his work during his twelve years at Southwark Cathedral, England, and a good deal of the value of the advice and directions given by the author lies in the fact that everything he advocates has been actually carried out by him in his own work. The book of 196 pages contains many musical and pictorial illustrations, the latter the work of Rachel Madeley Richardson, and is divided into three parts, dealing respectively with the constitution and management of a choir, voice production, and the rendering of church music. Of special value to the student of ecclesiastical music, and of choral art in general, are the chapters which trace the development of vocal rendering from the early days of plain song, through the Palestrina period, down to modern times. If Dr. Richardson's directions are studied and carried out, church music ought soon to be a much better thing than at present.

Rechlin Organ Recital Dates.

Edward Rechlin, the organist, pupil of Guilmant and Widor, announces a series of nine engagements just at this time, he being out of the city for that purpose. During the tour he goes as far west as St. Louis, Mo., and south to Maryland. These engagements are as follows: December 7, Cumberland, Md.; December 8, Elyria, Ohio; December 9, Grand Rapids, Mich.; December 10, Bay City, Mich.; December 11, Gebewaing, Mich.; December 13, Chicago, Ill.; December 15, Boone, Iowa; December 17, St. Louis, Mo.; December 18, Cleveland, Ohio.

Mrs. de Moss' Engagements.

Mary Hissem de Moss, the soprano, will be heard in five nearby cities within the next month, as follows: Newark, N. J., December 16; Roseville, N. J., December 20; Brooklyn, N. Y., December 27; East Orange, N. J., January 15, and Philadelphia, Pa., January 26.

A CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS

Victor Harris has promised to conduct the chorus of mixed voices, men and women, at the lighting of the Christmas Tree at Madison Square Park, New York, on Thursday, December 24, at 5:30. There will be no organized chorus present, but Mr. Harris is trying to get volunteers from all of the different clubs and choruses as well as from single individuals all over the city. It is sure that there will be a large and characteristic response for this worthy object under the direction of so noted a conductor as Mr. Harris.

The chorus is to meet and organize and to have its one rehearsal in Dr. Parkhurst's church, Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street, on December 24, at 4:30, and later on at 5:30 go over to the stand built for them and there have a little concert of Christmas music which will last until six o'clock. If by any chance the weather be inclement, the singing will not take place in the Square, but will be given at the same hour, 5:30, in Dr. Parkhurst's church. All singers, men and women, are invited to join the committee at Dr. Parkhurst's church on the afternoon of December 24 at 4:30, to take their share in what is really the most direct evidence of the Christmas spirit that any one can think of.

Sorrentino in Italy.

Umberto Sorrentino, the tenor, who went to Italy via England last May, was last heard from in Florence, Italy, where the journal, Lo Staffile, prints a picture of the good-looking young man and a brief sketch of his career. He has sung many times in various portions of the United States and last winter visited St. Louis as soloist with orchestra. His two successive appearances with the Rubinstein Club, New York, season 1913-1914, were brilliantly successful. Friends in New York look for his early return.

New Assembly Concert.

The New Assembly concert at Hotel Plaza, December 10, had the following soloists: Marguerite Baielie, pianist; Beata Karslakoff, soprano; Penelope Davies, mezzo-soprano; Keith MacDonald, baritone, and Harry Oliver Hirt, accompanist. This was a very enjoyable affair, adding much credit to Mme. Bell-Ranske, the founder and manager. Miss Baielie played piano solos with brilliancy and poetic touch. Mme. Karslakoff sang six songs, of which the first group by Robert H. Whitcomb was most enjoyable. These were beautiful songs, both in melody and harmony. Miss Davies sang in English, German and Italian; she, too, has an expressive voice. Mr. MacDonald sang Bemberg's "Hindoo Chant" especially well. He has a very sympathetic and highly expressive baritone voice, and should avoid extreme high notes. Harry Oliver Hirt was a capable accompanist, and the room was filled with interested hearers.

Becker Pupils Play.

December 5, at Wanamaker Auditorium, seven advanced piano pupils of Gustav L. Becker, assisted by Mme. Buckhout, soprano, participated in an hour of music. There were solos by Bach, Schubert, Beethoven, Chopin, Moszkowski, Liszt and MacDowell, performed by the following: Charlotte Jaeckle, Alice Levy, Gertrude Silverman, Ruth Sexton, Eric Johnson, Harold S. Clickner and Harry A. Jennison. All the young pianists received encouraging applause and much personal praise afterward. Mme. Buckhout sang a group of four songs by Mr. Becker with especial effect.

Two Nichols' Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. John W. Nichols, tenor and pianist, have just moved into their new studios, 28 West Sixty-third street, New York. They gave a joint recital at Columbia University, Thursday evening, December 10. Mr. Nichols has just been engaged for a performance of "The Messiah," by the Oratorio Society, Jamestown, N. Y., on December 29. This will be the third appearance in "The Messiah" for Mr. Nichols within five days.

Fisk Agency Choir Bureau.

The Fisk Agency announces that in connection with its department of music, it has established a church choir bureau under the management of O. J. Ehrgott, bass soloist, instructor in the art of singing and choir director. Auditions by appointment. 'Phone 3971 Gramercy. 156 Fifth avenue, New York.

Scholarship Voice Trial.

Zilpha Barnes Wood had a score of applicants for her free scholarship in vocal music, and on December 9 a committee of five heard the young singers. It was interesting to hear the various vocalists, of whom seven appeared before the committee. A coincidence was that each of these applicants had a German name. The only gentleman, a Mr. K., had a pleasant baritone voice but sang entirely by ear. Miss S. was musical, but well able to pay for instruction. The second Miss S., a girl of sixteen, emitted temperamental tones, almost all of them off the pitch. Miss K., singing in "The Lilac Domino" company, produced a very favorable impression. Miss P., aged sixteen, extremely nervous, short of breath, sang "The Song of the Soul." She showed much musical intuition combined with highly conscientious effort, which made a definitely favorable impression. Miss O., who sings in a Pelham church, had a most beautiful voice and pleasant personality, but has a clerical position, making her independent. Finally, Miss T. pleased the committee also.

The final decision was that Charlotte Pfeil (noted as "Miss P.") should be given the scholarship, and her progress will be watched with interest. The passing listener could make many observations on the personality and general appearance of these applicants, but the foregoing must suffice.

Boice Artists' Recital.

A recital of songs by Hallet Gilberté will be given at the residence studios of Mrs. Henry Smock Boice, 43 East Twenty-seventh street, tonight, December 16. The following artists will appear on the program: Katherine Bickford Self, soprano; Jessie Rowe Lockitt, contralto; Grace Douglass Bell, mezzo-soprano; Florence Anderson Otis, coloratura soprano; W. J. R. Thiers, tenor, and Willmar Bradshaw, baritone. There will also be a trio sung by nine young ladies. Mr. Gilberté will play the accompaniments.

Anna Rosenberg Plays.

Anna Rosenberg, pianist, who was a pupil of the elder Hoffmann (father of Josef Hoffmann) in Warsaw, Russian Poland, and now living at 1410 Prospect avenue, the Bronx, is a pianist of altogether exceptional ability. Before a private audience she recently played the following:

Excerpt from concerto.....Herz
Air de ballet.....Moszkowski
Etude .....Reinhold

Mrs. Rosenberg plays with finished technic and great animation. She has a temperament which illuminates everything she performs, making it real music. One possessing such attributes, with her linguistic gifts (she speaks four languages) should find appearances and pupils in plenty.

Adela Bowne in Italy.

"Greetings from a very quiet but beautiful Italy. We are in Naples on our first wedding anniversary day. We had a most exciting trip and will write you about it later. Yours, Adela Bowne Kirby." The foregoing is copied from a picture post card recently received from that artistic and statuesque soprano, Adela Bowne.

Music at the Strand.

The music at the Strand Theatre, of which the backbone is the beautiful orchestral organ, Herbert Sisson, chief organist, with a good sized orchestra under Carl Edouarde, continues daily, to the enjoyment of the immense audiences. Three vocal soloists were on the program last week, namely, Hattie Kneitel, soprano; Thornton D. Urquhart, tenor, and J. F. Weber, bass. These are all singers much above the ordinary. A special feature novelty was "Arthr Fricd-ham," as the house poster announced the name of the distinguished Liszt pupil, Arthur Friedheim. Mr. Friedheim played the sixth rhapsody by Liszt with brilliancy and his encore was Gottschalk's "The Banjo." Of Mr. Sisson's organ playing, it was at all times most appropriate, effective, and clean cut.

Notes.

Klaire H. Dowsey, the soprano of Manhasset, L. I., substituted for Florence Hinkle at the West End Collegiate Church, November 15 and November 29. She has been engaged as soprano soloist for "The Messiah" at Bound Brook, N. J.

Regina Hassler-Fox gave her first public recital, November 11, in Newark, N. J. Her success resulted in an mediate engagement for another Newark recital, in February, 1915.

Mme. Hassler-Fox's singing on Tuesday, November 24, as soloist in the Community Club concert, White Plains, N. Y., evoked great enthusiasm. She has been engaged for the concert to be given in the Newell Theatre, White Plains, on January 13.

Helen Ware in Texas.

Houston, Texas.

A prominent manager recently made this pertinent statement: "Show me your re-engagements and I will tell you how long your career will last." According to this, Helen Ware's career should indicate perpetual motion.

This unique violinist has succeeded in finding a trail all her own, which from all indications will bring her to the Hall of Fame. Last season she started out on her first American tour with little advertising and less trumpeting, and yet she succeeded in awakening the interest and admiration of serious musicians throughout the country. Helen Ware and Hungarian and Slav music have become synonymous since her first season's work. Her literary works on the subject and of late her bewitching arrangements of Hungarian folksongs for violin literature have given her a most prominent place among our foremost concert artists.

The music lovers of Houston joined the ranks of Helen Ware's enthusiasts on December 1. The earnestness, unaffected manners and soulful interpretations of this gifted young artist have demonstrated to her audiences beyond doubt that she is entitled to the tribute paid her by an enthusiastic European critic, i. e., "the most powerful and poetic interpreter of Hungarian and Slav music." The Houston press but re-echoes these sentiments in their glowing account of Helen Ware's interpretations of their soulful and gripping melodies.

Helen Ware is a refined artist and a marked individualist who asserts her authority in every phase of her work. It would make little difference whether Helen Ware followed a purely literary or any other branch of an artistic career, she would prove to be a true and impressively earnest artist under all conditions. Nothing speaks louder of her decided success in our midst than the keen pleasure Houston music lovers have expressed in their anticipation of her second visit during this coming spring.

Houston press opinions follow:

In presenting Helen Ware, violin virtuoso, to the public the Girls' Musical Club, Tuesday afternoon, rendered a genuine favor to fine arts. Playing with all her splendid talent and charm of presence, Miss Ware scored with a large audience of music lovers. Her program was exceptional and the numbers well chosen.

As an interpreter of Hungarian and Slav writers Miss Ware is great, . . . proof of the versatility of the charming violinist who can play the lugubrious mournfulness of a Slav melody thinker, the happy mountain stream dream of a Highland Scotchman and the shifting music of the Ethiopian.

Miss Ware's best work is with the Slav music. . . .

Inducting Miss Ware into Houston's musical life Mary Fuller and her co-workers have distinctly been solicitous for the culture life of Houston.—Houston Telegram, Houston, Tex., December 2, 1914.

Miss Ware impresses strongly through the eloquence of her all absorbing earnestness. The completeness of her concentration on the endeavor to serve as a minister of grace between the great composers and the people seems to possess her whole physical being along with all her intellectual and spiritual powers. . . .

Every movement, indeed every phrase, of the program's opening number, the concerto, was an exquisitely fine example of pure art, both compositional and interpretative. . . .

The little "Hungarian Love Song," composition of Miss Ware's own, was entrancingly graceful and sweet. It was for the most part in two-vocal melody double notes deliciously sounding in accord.

If I may be allowed to name the one selection on the program that provided to me personally the purest pleasure I should say without an instant's hesitation that Wilhelmj arrangement of the Schubert "Ave Maria." It was divinely played. . . .

Those who composed Miss Ware's big audience of yesterday are rejoiced by the knowledge that she is to be heard in Houston again this season.—Houston Post, Houston, Tex., December 2, 1914.

Hein and Fraemcke Institutions Concerts.

December 4 a program of eight numbers, consisting of vocal, piano and violin works, was given at the New York College of Music, August Fraemcke and Carl Hein, directors. One who attended the concert marked every individual number as exceptionally good. This can be believed because of the thorough instruction and musical ambition of all concerned. On the program were the following participants: Florence A. Buckley, Elsie M. Krauss, Tessie Garramone, Mary E. McCarthy, Madeline Giller, Edna Deiler, Lulu Mueller, and Lawrence Siry.

December 8 at College Hall pupils of the New York German Conservatory of Music took part in a program of solos and ensemble music. Much ability was shown in this program, which ranged from solos for piano, violin and voice, a two piano sonata by Mozart-Grieg, and to a trio from Kreutzer's opera, "Night in Granada." On this occasion excellent work was done by all of the following young artists: Elsie Dorkenwald, Mimi Beycnberg, Milly Maschmedt, Florence Ritchie, Meta Sundermann, Martha Mahlenbrock, G. Kritzler, Carl W. Heinrich, Gerald Reidy and G. Bernard.

Earl W. Morse, Violinist.

Earl W. Morse, a young American violinist, is another musician who, owing to war condition, was obliged to cancel a contract calling for many concerts abroad, and to return to his native land.

Morse has studied with Sevcik, Witek, Petschnikoff and Serato.

At his Berlin debut, November 7, 1911, he won favorable attention from prominent critics of the Prussian capital, also from later appearances in other European music centres, Leipsic, Halle, Hanover, Munich, Stettin-Schwerin, etc., attracted commending criticism.

W. Kaiser, the Leipsic critic, is said to have referred to Morse, when saying that the latter surely holds a passport to fame.

Morse played before the recently assassinated Duchess of Hohenberg and has been given the Schonborn crown of Austria.

The young violinist descends from a musical family. His grandfather, Prof. Constantin Watz, was for a long time director of a famous Milwaukee singing society and his father is an excellent amateur violinist.

This appeared in the Kgl. Prussian Staatsanzeiger: "Earl William Morse develops a beautiful, firm tone, a sure, fluent technic, deeper, however, a genuine feeling. Noble, first-class music only was offered."

"Earl William Morse," said the Signale, November 12, 1913, "is a good musician. His playing is genuinely musical and he shows a good technic."

From the Berlin Tageblatt, the following is taken:

"Morse played Cesar Frank's A major sonata with a beautiful warm tone, and pleasing vigor of expression."

Morse is soon to make his New York debut in recital.

Rose Olitzka's Chicago Recital.

Below are some press reviews of Rosa Olitzka's concert, Sunday, November 8, at the Illinois Theatre, Chicago.

The contralto's next concert was at Kalamazoo, Mich., December 9, and later she will appear in Minneapolis, Minn. In January she will go on a three weeks' tour through the Middle West, which will bring her to Denver.

These are the reviews:

Rosa Olitzka's annual recital at the Illinois Theatre, as usual, attracted the largest audience. . . . This popular contralto understands the art of program making and brings to her work sincerity, seriousness and artistic intelligence. . . . Her singing displayed all those traits which have made her one of Chicago's favorite singers.—Chicago Examiner, November 9, 1914.

Mme. Olitzka's annual appearances are always a cause of joy to her faithful band of followers. It is quite possible to sympathize with their feelings, for there is always something innately sincere, something wholesome and of true musicianship in her recitals. . . . They were sung with art, with feeling, and with entire musical honesty.—Chicago Daily Journal, November 9, 1914.

Rosa Olitzka has a host of loyal friends on whom she can count for her annual recital and yesterday afternoon the Illinois was filled with them. They greeted her warmly, applauded everything, at least all that we were there to hear, in the most cordial fashion, and evidently enjoyed themselves. Mme. Olitzka was in good voice, sang with understanding of the music and received the welcome of her friends with undoubted pleasure.—The Chicago Evening Post, Monday, November 9, 1914.

A large enthusiastic audience completely filled the Illinois Theatre at a recital given by Mme. Olitzka, Sunday afternoon, November 8, at the Illinois Theatre.

Mme. Olitzka's artistic reputation is so well established in Chicago that it need not be commented upon. The great charm of her art consists chiefly of an admirable combination of technical and musical qualities. It is astonishing how she keeps her great gifts under control; she neither gives too much, nor too little and ravishes her listeners by her dignified poise and masterly delivery. The deep, sincere feeling that goes out of her art gives proof of her intimate knowledge and insight into the spirit of the compositions and shows the presence of a wide, rich sensibility and temperament. . . . The artist was compelled by tremendous, enthusiastic ovation and applause to add several encores, which extended the concert to rather a late hour.—(Translation) Illinois Staats-Zeitung, November 9, 1914.

People's Symphony Concert, December 20.

Maud Powell has been touring the West, playing to capacity houses night after night. She returns to New York to play at the People's Symphony concert, Sunday afternoon, December 20, Carnegie Hall, and this will be her only engagement in the city. She will play the Beethoven concerto and "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso," by Saint-Saëns.

The orchestra, under the leadership of Conductor Franz X. Arens, will play Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Pathetique," as leading number. Owing to the war, and the many disbanded musical organizations in this country, it has been possible for the society to engage many excellent musicians, and Mr. Arens will conduct the finest orchestra ever assembled under his baton next Sunday afternoon. In addition to the symphony the program will include Weber's "Freischütz" overture.

In order to make its work still more effective, the society has this year extended the privilege of securing seats at half rates to teachers, artists and professional people, as well as students and wage earners. A seat in the parquet section of Carnegie Hall for 12½ cents! In order to obtain half rates it is necessary to secure seats at the office of the society, 32 Union square. Full rates will be charged at the box office on the night of the concert.

Musicales at Country Life Exposition.

A number of vocalists and instrumentalists, as well as musical institutions, of New York City, are taking advantage of the offer of the Country Life Permanent Exposition, to hold recitals, free of charge.

The Country Life Exposition is held in a large upper hall of the Grand Central Terminal, New York. Its lecture room seats several hundred people, and many times a week music holds sway there. Musical attractions scheduled for the immediate future are as follows: The New York School of Music and Art, of which Ralfe Leech Sterner is director, at 56 West Ninety-seventh street, New York City, will give concerts on the following Saturdays: January 2, January 30, February 13, February 27, and March 13.

Mrs. A. M. Virgil, of the Virgil School of Music, at 42 West Seventy-sixth street, New York City, is to hold a piano recital on January 16.

Other arts allied to music are represented also at the exposition, notably dramatic entertainments, by Prof. Alfred E. Henderson, director of the Henderson Players, Aeolian Hall, and Greek and national dancing by Cozette Keller.

May Scheider Heard in French Arias.

May Scheider, of the Karlsruhe Royal Opera, another singer who was obliged to return to America because of the war, sang at a benefit given by the Vacation Committee, at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York, Friday afternoon, December 11.

Her numbers were the Debussy aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue" and an aria from "Manon," Massenet.

These served to disclose a well schooled voice, clear and of pleasing timbre. Musicianship and good taste accompanied her delivery of both the numbers and her singing merited the warm reception which she received.

Bruno Huhn was, as usual, an efficient accompanist.

Florence Austin With Dutch Society.

Florence Austin, violinist, played, December 12, for the oldest Dutch society in New York, "The Eendracht Maakt Nacht," the occasion being the fifty-first "St. Nicholas Festival." This society, which is taking care of many of the Belgian refugees in Holland, will send the proceeds of the concert to them. Miss Austin played the polonaise by Vieuxtemps for her first number, and a group of smaller solos, including "Souvenir," by Weitzel, and "Valse de Concert," by Ovide Musin.

MINNEAPOLIS ORCHESTRA PLAYS THREE PROGRAMS.

Symphonic Body Appears in Regular Concert at a Sunday "Pop" and in Beethoven Cycle —Other Musical Events of the Week.

Minneapolis, Minn., December 11, 1914.

Two works of importance were given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at the fortnightly concert, December 4, in the Auditorium. Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and Chausson's "Viviano" were both interesting, but the former was perhaps more to the liking of the general public. Karl Scheurer was the violinist and with the fine delineations drawn by Conductor Emil Oberhoffer the work was given a splendid reading. The name of Chausson appeared on these programs for the first time and it is safe to say that it will again grace them.

"Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9, was the opening number of the program and was a fine prologue to the next, which was "Harold in Italy," by the same composer. Dukas' scherzo, "L'Aprenti," closed the performance and the orchestra again acquitted itself with great credit.

Helen Stanley, soprano, was the soloist, and her sweet voice was used to great advantage in the tender Micaela aria from "Carmen." She sang quite as brilliantly an aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," by Debussy. Miss Stanley was given a veritable ovation and responded to encores—one by Massenet and the other from "La Boheme."

Sunday Orchestral Concert.

Minneapolitans can go every Sunday to the Auditorium and hear the very best music at a small outlay of money, and judging from the large audiences people do appreciate this privilege. The program of Sunday, December 6, was unusually attractive, beginning with the march from Raff's "Leonore" symphony, and was followed by Dvorák's "Carnival," op. 92. The third number was "Angelus" largo from the third symphony of Hadley—which was given a fine rendition. "Unter den Linden," from the "Scenes Alsaciennes," by Massenet, was beautiful; the cello in the able hands of Cornelius van Vliet and the answers by the clarinet, well played by Pierre Perrier, are a joy. This number always appeals to the audience and one could never tire of it when played as the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra plays it. "The Sorcerer's Apprentice," by Dukas, was very interesting and came as a great contrast to the classical "Andante Cantabile" from the string quartet, op 11, by Tschaikowsky. Glazounow's "Valse de Concert" closed this day's program.

The soloist was Andrea Sarto, the American baritone, who sang the prologue from "Pagliacci" and the aria "Ella giamai," from Verdi's "Don Carlos." His voice is clear and clean and his enunciation fine. Mr. Sarto was enthusiastically recalled and repeated the prologue after his first appearance, and the "Evening Star," Wagner, after his second solo.

Beethoven Cycle.

The second afternoon concert of the Beethoven Cycle was given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Monday, December 7. The larger part of the program lay in the second and seventh symphonies—the second beginning the program and the seventh closing it. The slower movements in both symphonies carried real inspiration to the audience. The lovely romance for violin played by Richard Czerwonky gave music lovers opportunity to hear that composition presented in all its perfection of simple dignity. The rich G string harmonies were without a flaw—it was Mr. Czerwonky at his best.

Marion Green, basso-cantante, was the singer of the afternoon, his offerings being "Mit Maedeln sich vertragen," and a group of songs, "In Questa Tomba," "Bitten" and "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur," magnificently sung. His tones, of bell-like purity, never wavered a fraction off pitch. The Auditorium has rarely been filled with a more perfect voice.

These Beethoven concerts seem to be the coveted opportunity for many students and lovers of music to make a most satisfying acquaintance with the master. This was evidenced by the two balconies which were filled, and the rather surprising thing is the large number of men in attendance, quite as many as are seen at any evening concert.

A Sonata Recital.

A sonata recital was given by Raymond Shryock and his sister, Eloise, at the Unitarian Church, December 2. Mr. Shryock has long been one of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra players and has endeared himself to the public by his good, clean violin work and his gracious, unaffected manner. The three sonatas played were the D major, op. 12, No. 1, Beethoven; the D minor, op. 108, of Brahms, and the G minor, op. 19, of Sjögren. Great sympathy exists between these two charming artists. In the Beethoven sonata the piano was a little too heavy—the Brahms, the double stops of the violin were splendid and there were daintiness and passionate brilliancy quite remarkable. These two painstaking artists are helping to do all the pioneer work in Minneapolis and they will some day gain the credit that they deserve for being so unselfish in their efforts to establish the best music here.

Orchestral Art Society Concert.

Twice a year the Orchestral Art Society gives a concert under the direction of William MacPhail, the violinist. On December 3 this society appeared at Gethsemane Church. The orchestra numbers fifty players; the violinists are the pupils of Mr. MacPhail, of the MacPhail Violin School; all these young people come together for the love of good music. The hall was filled, the music was well prepared and Mr. MacPhail conducted in a most convincing manner, and there was good shading throughout. The concert was opened by the allegretto from the "Military" symphony of Haydn, followed by the minuet, op. 78, of Schubert; the scherzo, op. 28, of Beethoven; the andante from the "Surprise" symphony, played with good volume of tone and excellent rhythm; the overture, "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart, brilliantly and energetically performed. This string choir deserves much praise for the artistic work done on this evening.

Ralph Truman, pupil of Mr. MacPhail, played the first movement of the Mendelssohn concerto with orchestra. The orchestra accompanied well and Mr. Truman gave an encore, "Souvenir," by Drdla. The other soloist of the evening was Mildred Ozias, soprano, who had just returned from two years' study in Berlin, and who sang "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," and a group of songs—"The Last Leaf," by Homer; "Oh, Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?" by Handel; "Sylvelin," by Sinding, and "Boat Song," by Harriet Ware. Miss Ozias adapts herself to the mood of the song and, though her voice is small, she makes a fine effect with her artistic renditions. Her enunciation is excellent and she was forced to respond to two insistent encores.

Musical School Teachers.

There are fourteen teachers of the North High School who are musicians, and the concerts that they give are excellent. These fourteen men make a splendid glee club and four of them are good pianists. With vocal solos and a clever play, these teachers were tendered an ovation by friends at their second concert of this season, December 5. The eight hand piano arrangement of "Der Freischütz" is to be especially commended, the glee club sang well and the quartet sang very well.

Oscar Seagle's Song Recital.

Oscar Seagle, baritone, was heard here on December 2 at the First Baptist Church, assisted by Frank Bibb, pianist. Mr. Seagle sang a program of songs that showed him to be a master of every line of the vocal art. He excels in intelligence, in perfection of technic, in clever delineation of any song he sings, and possesses a most friendly, engaging personality. Frank Bibb proved himself a sympathetic accompanist.

An Interesting Joint Recital.

Unusual interest attended the joint recital given at the First Baptist Church on the night of December 3 by Esther Osborn, soprano, and Mr. and Mrs. James Bliss, both local pianists. Miss Osborn has enjoyed success abroad as prima donna soprano in the Royal Theatre, Stockholm, and the Stadt Theatre, in Hamburg. She sang most exacting songs in German, Swedish and English. "Il est doux," from "Herodiade," by Massenet, was given a musicianly rendition. Her breadth of interpretation was allowed full sway in the arias from "Figaro," viz, "Cavatine der Grafin" and "Arie der Susanne." Her clear voice was used to perfection in two Brahms songs, "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Das Madchen spricht." A dainty French song by Hue, "J'ai pleure en reve," was finely sung. Her enunciation is faultless and her versatility was shown in a group of varied songs—Grieg's "Et Had," Alfen's "Bon," Jarnefelt's "Solsken," Roger's "The Star" and Hammond's "The Lovely Month of May." With all the maturity of a finished artist, Miss Osborn has retained the pure lyric quality that was in her voice when she was first told that she had a future. She sang Verdi's "Ah fors e lui che l'anima" with finish and abandon. Floral tributes and much applause greeted her every appearance.

Mr. and Mrs. Bliss have just returned from a year's sojourn in Berlin under the tutelage of Rudolph Ganz. Mrs. Bliss played all the accompaniments for Miss Osborn in a sympathetic manner. Mr. Bliss performed a group of MacDowell's smaller compositions, a new work to us, by Granados; the F major prelude and fuga, by Bach; "Over the Fence Is Out," by J. K. Paine; "Pan Coming From Bacchus," by Juon; "Ach, du lieber Augustine," by Max Reger, and three compositions of his own. His second sonata in C minor shows great progress and much talent. The playing of both Mr. Bliss and his wife shows earnest study, and now they have the ground work for a whole life's application of study.

The Conservatory Club held its monthly business meetings on Monday and completed arrangements for a bazaar and candy sale to take place Wednesday, December 9. All kinds of useful articles and Christmas novelties will be on sale and the proceeds will be used for various social affairs which the club is planning to give. The club also announces a concert to take place in January in Conservatory Hall.

John Seaman Garns, director of the school of expression, entertained 150 children, who were the guests of the South Side Mission, on Thanksgiving Day. Mr. Garns told stories for two hours. His program included two old Irish folk tales, three dialect stories in Italian, Scandinavian and Irish, also a Russian folk legend.

RUTH ANDERSON.

Music Will Out.

Kitchener's army is likely to be remembered as the musicless army, from the fact that when there is so much to be done and so little time to do it in, the formation of regimental bands is out of the question. Still, the adaptability of the new recruit and his attempts to make good the deficiencies in some form or another are remarkable. For instance, the other day I came across one of the new battalions route marching to the strains of instruments the tone and color of which, for the moment, puzzled me. Doubtless distance lent enchantment to the ear. The tune was, of course, the inevitable "Tipperary," but the effect, thanks to Nature's mellowing influence, was far from unpleasant, or, for the matter of that, unmusical.

Then round a bend in the road swung the motley clothed files, preceded by a band composed of mouth organs. Perhaps Joseph Holbrooke, who is ever in search of new color, will be grateful for the hint.—London Evening Standard.

Recital at American Institute.

On December 11, at Chamber Music Hall, New York, Leslie Hodgson, a member of the faculty of the American Institute of Applied Music, gave a recital of piano pieces, ranging from Chopin to F. Morris Class. He plays with vigorous, fluent technic, good colored tone, and artistic interpretation, making his pianism effective in various styles. Eight Chopin pieces were played with virility and delicate shading; the polonaise, op. 44, indeed, was splendidly done. Quaint and charming was Class' "Adown the Lanes," and a barcarolle by Griffes and concert waltz by Granados, closing the program, were played with brilliant effect. The climax of the evening was Liszt's "Ballade"; this was done with comprehension and brilliant passage work.

The audience filled the hall, and was enthusiastic, compelling Mr. Hodgson to add an extra number to his last group.

Mme. Genovese Will Entertain.

Invitations have been issued for an informal musical tea at Mme. Genovese's studio, 1425 Broadway, New York, Thursday, December 17, between 4 and 6 o'clock.

OLIVER DITSON NOVELTIES ARE HEARD IN BOSTON.

Employees and Salesmen of Musical Publishing House Attend a Concert Given for the Purpose of Acquainting Them With New Publications of the Past Year—Program Preceded by a Dinner at City Club—Symphony Concerts and Other Affairs of the Week in and Around the Hub.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., December 12, 1914.

A first recital of Ditson novelties was given at the Harvard Musical Association on Wednesday evening, December 9. This affair was for a purpose, unique as recitals go, for the audience was composed of men connected with the Oliver Ditson Company establishment in Boston. As William Arms Fisher, head of the editing department, announced in a short address at the commencement of the concert, the program had been arranged with the intention of allowing the salesmen and all those connected with the Ditson publishing house a chance to become better acquainted with new publications of the last twelve months, by hearing them performed. The Boston representative of the MUSICAL COURIER had the pleasure of attending the concert and found the Ditson family a most enjoyable unit. Before the concert took place every one was invited to the City Club, where dinner was served, and incidentally some very brilliant (round table) talk was forthcoming. Mr. Fisher tells stories with the same ardor and effectiveness that he employs when securing successful compositions for his house. The dinner made a hit, just as many of the numbers heard on the program have already done with the musical public. The local artists chosen to perform the various numbers were Karl Rissland, violinist; Herbert W. Smith, baritone, and William B. Maclane, tenor. The numbers heard revealed wide diversity of style and furnished proof of the Oliver Ditson Company's ability to secure material worth while. The program in full was as follows:

"Care-Free," Lemont, "Clotilde," Lemont, "La Debutante," Lemont, "Valse Courante," Rolfe, "A Propos" (intermezzo), Sartorio, Mr. Henning; "Longing," Pütz, "In Dreams," Kramer, "Japanese Love Song," Kroeger, "Blue Are Her Eyes," Watts, "To One I Love," Saar, Mr. Maclane; "Madrigale," Rissland, "Valse Caprice," Rissland, "Fatima," Hamilton, "From the Hearth," Burleigh, "Song Without Words," Tschaikowsky, Mr. Rissland; "To My Valentine," "The Caress," "Serenade Mexicaine" (from "Dream Pictures"), Lamont, No. 5 from "Five Vignettes," Class, Humoreske from "Five Intermezzi," Class, Scherzo minuet, Manney, Mr. Manney; "Love's Triumph" (a cycle of five songs), Huhn, Mr. Smith; "Le Désir," Steinfeldt, "A Merry Hornpipe," Fletcher, "Summer Seas" (barcarolle), Huerter, "The Jesters," Huerter, "Valse," in A flat, Frey, Mr. Henning; "For You," Montague, "Even Song," Johnson, "The Heart of Her," Cadman, "A Wish," Dichmont, "My Day," Dichmont, Mr. Maclane; "Autumn," Williams, "At the Spring," Lazarus, "Naiveté," Kürsteiner, "Two Venetian Lovers," Hamilton, Mr. Manney; "A Winter Song," Hyatt, "A Song of Joy," Douty, "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes," Fisher, "Witch-Woman," Taylor, "Heart of Hearts," Manney, Mr. Smith; "At Dawning," Cadman, "The Dancers," Lemont, "Romance," Debussy, "Thinking of You," Dichmont, "Polish Dance," Adamowski, Mr. Rissland.

BAUER-TEYTE JOINT RECITAL.

Before an audience which practically filled Symphony Hall, Harold Bauer and Maggie Teyte appeared in a joint recital Sunday afternoon, December 6. Mr. Bauer was heard in the Schumann "Carnival," op. 9; "Air de Ballet," from "Alceste," Gluck-Saint-Saëns; scherzo in B flat minor, Chopin; etude in D flat, Liszt, and the "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner.

BOSTON MUSIC SCHOOL SETTLEMENT CONCERT.

Another of the concerts for the people, under the auspices of the Boston Music School Settlement, was given on Sunday afternoon, December 6, at the Boston Theatre. Mme. Gerville-Reache, contralto, and the Hoffmann String Quartet, participated in the program. As has been the usual custom, a large audience was present and enthusiasm ran high throughout the afternoon. Mme. Gerville-Reache was in splendid voice and her singing of Massenet's "Air de Posthumia" and Saint-Saëns' "La Cloche" (her first numbers), was admirable. A second group, in which composers Spontini, Gluck and Salter were represented, also brought "The Call of Radha," by Harriet Ware, for a first hearing in this city. The final group of songs contained two Paladilhe numbers, "Lamenti Provencal" and "Psyche," "L'Heure de Pourpe," by Holmes, and Hahn's "D'Une Prison." The contralto was heartily applauded after each group and was twice obliged to add several encores.

The Hoffmann Quartet gave a good account of itself in well defined readings of the several short numbers and the Haydn fifth quartet, which made up their share of the entertainment.

HEINRICH GEBHARD'S PIANO RECITAL.

Heinrich Gebhard, the well known Boston pianist and teacher, gave his first recital of the season at Jordan Hall, Wednesday afternoon, December 9. Mr. Gebhard has a splendid following here, and consequently the audience at his concert was large and appreciative. His program opened with the Bach French suite in E major and the pianist at once showed that he possesses all his former brilliancy, and has grown in interpretative powers since his last year's recital here. Mr. Gebhart is deeply sincere, and his technic is tremendous. In the second group, a Chopin set, his readings were clearly and beautifully set forth. Seven Debussy numbers formed the unique feature of the pianist's program and they were given splendid interpretations. One can hardly imagine Mr. Gebhard at his best in the modern music, but this performance served to change general impressions, and one must now add that he is equally at home either in the older or the newer classics. Liszt's arrangement of the "Spinning Song," from the "Flying Dutchman," two interesting numbers by Albeniz, viz., tango in D and "Seguidilla," and the Verdi-Liszt paraphrase on the "Rigoletto" quartet completed the program. Mr. Gebhard is an artist of whom Bostonians may well be proud.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At the seventh pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place on Friday afternoon, December 11, and Saturday evening, December 12, the Beethoven symphony in F minor, together with Stravinsky's "Fireworks," the Schumann overture to "Genoveva" and the Haydn concerto in D major for cello, made up the program. The orchestra has a reputation for its performances of Beethoven symphonies and apparently Dr. Karl Muck and his men did their best to live up to this reputation. The outcome was highly successful. Stravinsky's number was played here several weeks ago by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and it was heard again at these concerts with enthusiasm. Josef Malkin, the new cellist of the orchestra, who is at the first desk of his section with Mr. Warnke, was the soloist. He is an artist of wonderful attainments and his playing here created a veritable sensation. The overture, played in a faultless manner, made a well balanced finish to the program.

gave a recital in Jordan Hall, Monday afternoon. Mr. Maier is a talented young man, and his musicianship is strongly individual. The program was unique in various ways. He showed himself to be a composer of merit in the two numbers of his own which were included in his program. His "Valse Grotesque" is a happy combination of modern piano effects. In the Brahms "Intermezzo" and the Beethoven third sonata, evidence of the player's true virtuosity was revealed. Other numbers on the program included a Schubert andantino and scherzo; gavotte from "Alceste," by Gluck; "Perpetual Motion," by Weber, and short descriptive numbers by Philipp and Liszt.

HANNAH BUTLER DELIGHTS AUDIENCE.

Hannah Butler gave a recital of modern French and German songs in the John Knowles-Paine concert hall on Monday evening. This well known soprano from Chicago was most enthusiastically received by her many admirers here. The songs on her program furnished sufficient proof of the rare versatility of her art, and her manner of rendering them was pleasing in the extreme. Mrs. Butler possesses rare interpretative ability and her versions of the various modern numbers were strikingly original, showing a keen understanding of the newer school of music. Her voice is of a lovely quality and her knowledge of its use is thorough in every detail. The modern songs were Strauss, Brahms, Wolf, Vidal, Faure, Debussy, Godard, Carpenter, Rimsky-Korsakow, Bachelet, Lie, Korling, Grieg and Charpentier.

A PIANIST NEW TO BOSTON.

On Monday afternoon, December 7, another new pianist, Hans Ebell, gave his first recital of the season in Steinert Hall. Mr. Ebell has been much talked about in local music circles, as many Bostonians had personally known of the young artist's brilliant success in the concert field abroad. He was accorded a flattering reception by both public and press. The program was as follows: Schumann, fantasie, op. 17; Glazounow, sonata, op. 74; Chopin, barcarolle, mazurka, op. 33, prelude in A flat major; and the waltz, op. 64; Scriabine, teude, and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire."

FLONZALEY QUARTET CONCERT.

The first concert of the season by the Flonzaley Quartet was given at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening of this week. Tschaikowsky's E flat major quartet opened the program and, needless to say, it was performed in faultless style. A quartet number by Darius Milhaud, consisting of two movements; an intime-contenu and a rhythmique arrangement, heard in Boston for the first time, was made interesting by the skillful Flonzaley playing. Beethoven's B major quartet concluded the program, which attracted the largest audience that Jordan Hall has held thus far this season. Appreciative applause punctuated the superb work of the Flonzaleys, who return to Jordan Hall in one month, much to the joy of lovers of string quartet music.

DRAPER AND BESEKIRSKY AT BENEFIT CONCERT.

Paul Draper, the tenor, and Wassily Besekirsky, violinist, were the soloists at a concert for the benefit of the South Boston Day Nursery, which was given in Jordan Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 10. The following program was given:

"Le Trille du Diable" (Tartini, Mr. Besekirsky; "Tu lo sal" (old Italian), "Come raggio di sol" (Caldara), "Bois Epais," "Le héros que j'attends" (Lully), Mr. Draper; "Rêverie" (W. Besekirsky). "Slavic Dance" (A. Dvorak), Mr. Besekirsky; "Dedication" (Percy Aldridge Grainger), "Six Dukes Went A'fishin,'" "Died for Love," "Willow, Willow" (set by Percy Aldridge Grainger), "A Reiver's Neck"—verse (Percy Aldridge Grainger), Mr. Draper; "Carmen," fantasie brillante (J. Hubay), Mr. Besekirsky.

Mr. Draper was in splendid voice and he aroused new interest here, for at his recital a few weeks ago only German Lieder were heard. Draper's versatility as an artist of very rare accomplishments is indeed marked. His interpretations are intensely interesting and his musicianship is beyond all reproach.

Mr. Besekirsky gave a good account of himself. His tone is excellent and his interpretations reveal his earnestness as a musician. Walter Golde, the accompanist now appearing with Mr. Draper, played in a highly satisfactory manner.

Although he has only been in this country about three months, Mr. Draper had made quite an enviable record for Boston appearances. Two recitals and one solo appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra are already to his credit and, according to present arrangements, the tenor is to return again as soloist in the Liszt "Faust Symphony" which will be given at the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, January 1 and January 2.

TOWNSEND CHORAL SOCIETY HEARD.

Stephen Townsend and his Choral Music Society, of Boston, gave their first concert of this season at Jordan Hall on Wednesday evening, December 9. The assisting artists were W. Lynnwood Farnam, organist; R. Ringwall and M. Grunberg, violinists, and J. Angus Winter, pianist. The work of the chorus was very effective and the singers displayed their excellent training, a real tribute to their accomplished conductor, Mr. Townsend. The program showed much variety, representing Bach, Gevaert, Tschaikowsky, Lotti, Rachmaninoff, Brahms, Elgar, Henschel, Karg-Elert, Ford-Festa, Foote, Lewis, Lang and Converse in their choral compositions.

BOSTON NOTES.

On Tuesday afternoon, December 8, another pianist was heard in recital at Steinert Hall. Flora Shwale was the artist in question, and her appearance attracted a fairly large audience. The program was devoted to several modern French compositions, two MacDowell groups and numbers by Schumann, Mendelssohn and Chopin.

Selma Nussbaum, soprano, pupil of Frederick Watermann, appeared in a short song recital given under the direction of the Wellington Studio of Fine Arts at the Philip Brooks Hall, Tuesday afternoon, December 8. This talented young soprano has been under Mr. Watermann's tutelage for a very few months only, but she displays an ability truly surprising. Her voice is rich and beautiful in quality and she posseses fine interpretative ability. Her singing evidently pleased all those who heard her.

VICTOR WINTON.

Miller-Van der Veer Journey.

Thirty-five engagements, involving travel of over 8,000 miles, is the record to the credit of Nevada van der Veer since the middle of October. This vocalist has been engaged continuously since the opening of the season, and has sung with greater success than ever from one end of the country to the other.

NEVADA VAN DER VEER.
Snapped last summer.

Mme. van der Veer's tour has taken her to Spartanburg, S. C.; Detroit, Milwaukee, Appleton, Wis.; Davenport, Ia.; Sioux Falls, S. Dak.; Sioux City, Ia., and Peoria, Ill., and everywhere she was cordially received. But the engagement that impressed the singer as the most successful one of her career was in Syracuse, where in a joint recital with her husband, Reed Miller, she appeared before the Arts Club amid much enthusiasm.

"The elements of success," declares the singer, in commenting upon this appearance, "are, first, a fine artistic program, something to work for. Second, one must be in good voice, and sympathetically accompanied. Third, to have the audience with one in appreciation and understanding. All of these elements were supplied in Syracuse, and that is why I look back upon the engagement with such satisfaction."

REED MILLER IN HIS NEW YORK STUDIO.

That the Syracuse organization engaging the singers was equally pleased, is indicated by a letter received by Loudon Charlton, under whose management Mme. van der Veer and Mr. Miller are to be in the future. The letter expressed the thorough satisfaction derived from the recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Miller are now in New York for a brief rest. After Christmas they will start "for the front" again, appearing in "Stabat Mater" in Schenectady, in a recital with the Rubinstein Club of Washington, and in "Aida" in Huntington, W. Va. The new year will be marked by a long series of engagements of importance.

Stewart to Be Congratulated.

The MUSICAL COURIER is in receipt of the following telegram from its San Diego, Cal., correspondent:

San Diego, Cal., December 11, 1914.

Musical Courier, New York:

Ethel Smyth writes to the London Observer of October 25, 1914:

SIR—With all deference to "experts," who seem to have been abusing it, may I record my humble opinion that "Tipperary" is a little masterpiece in its way? The melody—cheery, fascinating and funny—is so natural that four simple chords make up the whole outfit of the accompaniment, and yet, like folksongs and melodies of Schubert that also pass this severe test, with all its rollicking humor there is no touch of vulgarity. I should think nothing could more exactly embody the careless, jocular spirit in which the British soldier sheathes his nerves, and which is so incomprehensible and distressing to Teutonic seriousness.

As for the rhythmic design of the whole song, whether due to instinct or cunning, anything cleverer I have seldom seen; first a bit of breakdown, which takes two strides per musical section; then the tune proper, in four-step sections; finally the chorus, broadening out into a swinging eight-step rhythm, whereby the marcher is unconsciously and irresistibly swept along over spaces of increasing length with increasing impetus.

Or again, note the deft and sparing use of the syncope. Evidently this tune, of remote Anglo-Saxon ancestry, is the immediate product of the American war song and rag time. Be that as it may, it seems to me that the dead must respond to such an appeal, and swing into rank with the living.

The only part of the delightful words the soldier knows is the chorus. One can understand why these catch on, but what of the sure instinct that strung the phrases together—the "long, long way"; the sentimental touch, for once free from mawk; the very delicately conveyed suggestion of lurid delights rejected for the sake of "the sweetest girl I know"? (Not only the average young man, but many of us enjoy feeling actually good and potentially wicked at the same time!) And how perfectly the composer has caught the musical equivalent of the beautiful word "Tipperary."

I am certain that all front rank musicians I know of foreign nationalities, and I think also men like Mozart and Schubert, would delight in this song. To my mind there is the touch about it that makes Arthur Sullivan immortal. The difference between it and vulgar music hall ditties that have a passing vogue is as the difference between a perfect French omelette and the English lodging-house imitation. I venture to think it a grand bit of luck that, when war broke out, this song, an ideal marching tune for the British soldier, was in the air.

When first I heard it I remembered a joke of Brahms'. Asked by a young lady for a musical autograph, he scrawled the opening bars of "On the Blue Danube," and wrote under them: "Alas! not by Johannes Brahms." I do not know if many composers sighed to themselves on hearing "Tipperary," "I wish I had written that!" But I know I did.

Your obedient servant, ETHEL SMYTH.

"Things That Never Happen."

Under the caption of "Things That Never Happen" a newspaper cartoonist gives the instance of a vocal teacher who says to the "stupid who is about to invest in a few vocal lessons":

"Ah, your voice is wonderful! Your last vocal instructor must have been a corker. I really wouldn't give you my humble services for fear of ruining your voice."

May we nominate the following candidates for this series:

1. Operatic soprano (hearing a rival sing her favorite role): "Isn't her Isolde a tragic masterpiece! And how well she sang the 'Liebestod.' Would that I had such nobility of gesture."

2. Concert artist (returning from a tour): "How was my business on the road? Terrible! Only one full house. The criticism? All lukewarm, and not one reengagement."

3. Returning opera star (to photographers on dock): "Stop! I refuse to have my picture taken. Who knows, it might get into the newspapers."

4. Musical manager (speaking of violinist who is to be imported by rival manager): "That Fiddolini is a real artist. My man Scraper may have some appeal to the gallery, but as to musicianship—he's not in the other fellow's class."

5. Music critic (hearing premiere of new composition): "The audience seemed to like the work, but I don't. Still, my judgment is no more to be accepted than that of the public. It's merely the opinion of one man and many in the audience are quite as well informed as I."—Houston (Tex.) Chronicle.

Rubinstein Club Concert.

Members of the Metropolitan, Berlin and Cassel operatic galaxy helped to open the New York Rubinstein Club (Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, president) concert season in a highly auspicious manner. These were Lucy Gates, coloratura soprano, and Edoardo Fontana Ferrari, tenor.

Extensive operatic experience abroad seems in no way to have infringed upon a delightful style in Miss Gates' concert singing. This young artist, who, by the way, is typically American, embodying all that the name carries with it, sings unaffectedly, with a refreshingly natural charm of manner, and withal forcefully and convincingly. Rare intelligence and feeling accompany the delivery of her songs.

The "Bell Song" from "Lakme" (Delibes), introduced her to the club, and while this is hardly the place for a detailed review of Miss Gates' numbers, one can hardly refrain from comment on the strikingly bell-like quality of her voice, to be noted alike in the pianissimo and forte notes and passages; her smooth, even runs suggestive of the cadenza of a violin, her easy, well sustained and pleasing high tones and her fine musical sense.

Her lovely quality of voice, mood creating ability and delightful diction were emphasized again in her group of songs, which included Harriet Ware's dreamy "Boat Song," MacDowell's "In the Woods" (repeated), Marie Wiegenlied (Reger), and Allabief's "Nachtigall."

A double encore followed this group, in the second of which Miss Gates accompanied herself.

Edoardo Fontana Ferrari, the Metropolitan Opera Company tenor, was not so much of a stranger to members of the club as the soprano. The aria "L'Africaine" (Meyerbeer), aria, "Tosca" (Puccini) and a group of songs, "Torna Amore" (Buzzia Peccia), "Romanza" (Denza) and "Visione Veneziana" (repeated), showed that this artist's sympathetic and vibrant voice was in excellent condition and that he was in his usual happy mood. It seems almost needless to say that he pleased the Rubinsteins and their guests immensely and that he, too, was called upon for several encores.

Three numbers only of the choral numbers were not "arangements." These were Arthur Hartmann's "Sisters Awake" (dedicated to the club); Lassen's "Home Sighs" and "Wake Miss Lindy," Warner. The others were: Friml's "At Twilight" (arranged by Paul Ambrose) and "Love Is Like a Firefly" (arranged by Homer N. Bartlett), "Dawn's Awakening" and "A Swan," Grieg (arranged by Lucien G. Chaffin), Schubert's "The Almighty" (arranged by Louis Victor Saar), Bizet's "This Flower You Gave Me" (from "Carmen") and Dvorák's "Gypsy Songs, No. 3" (arranged by Harry Rowe Shelley). It is interesting to note that these arrangements were all by American composers.

Of the choral numbers "The Almighty" seemed the most effective in its general ensemble, volume of tone and finish, although the Grieg arrangements by Chaffin should not be passed over without especial attention being drawn to the good coloring, phrasing and climaxes. Each of the choral numbers fully sustained the tradition for excellent work, earned from twenty-seven seasons under the same efficient leadership, that of William Rogers Chapman, whose festival work has also brought him honor.

To Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, the president of the club, is due more than a word of commendation for her zeal in the interest of young American musicians, for her valuable assistance in Mr. Chapman's work, and for the splendid management of the New York Rubinstein Club.

In "The Almighty," Eulalia Cannon, soprano, a member of the chorus, sang the incidental solo, revealing a well trained voice of good quality and a young singer with much poise.

Although the weather was far from ideal, there was no hint of it in the Grand Ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria, which was taxed to its capacity on this occasion, Tuesday evening, December 8, with the usual brilliant assemblange which Rubinstein Club concerts are wont to attract.

Cecil Fanning at Lexington, Ky.

A scene of unusual brilliancy greeted Cecil Fanning as he stepped upon the stage of the Ben Ali Theatre, at Lexington, Ky., the evening of December 7. The occasion was the first concert of the season given by the Kentucky Branch of the Southern Association of College Women. Every box was taken by alumni of different American colleges, including Vassar, Wellesley, Smith, Yale, Princeton, and each box was profusely decorated with the pennants and colors of the various colleges. The festive spirit of the gala occasion seemed to enter into Mr. Fanning's interpretations, and the audience gave him a tremendous ovation. Eight extra songs were demanded, and Mr. Fanning and Mr. Turpin were recalled many times to bow their acknowledgment of the applause.

The following article is taken from the Lexington Herald, December 8:

Brilliant indeed was the concert given last evening at the Ben Ali by that popular baritone, Cecil Fanning. . . . this singer and his splendid accompanist . . . in the best of moods to bring his most exquisite offerings to his audience.

He must have realized that the entire assembly felt not only distinct sympathy with their work, but a warm feeling of genuine friendship as well, because of their previous visits here. And certainly this condition between artists and audience added much to the evening's pleasure.

A decided point was scored in the first number, the wonderful "I Pagliacci" prologue, when Mr. Fanning sang it in English. It was really, as it was intended to be, an address to the audience. An exquisite encore was "A Song of India," by Rimsky-Korsakoff. In the second number we had a beautiful group of varied German songs rising gradually to a superb climax in Loewe's "Der Erlkonig." . . . This was well sung, highly dramatic and appreciated.

"Edward," the old Scottish ballad, was the most tragic and dramatic number presented and the terrible curse at the end left the audience tense with feeling. This was probably Mr. Fanning's best number, as it required the power of portraying two distinct characters, mother and son. And throughout it was very dramatic.

Group IV was catchy and light and the two old French songs were made even more delightful by being sung in their original style, with action. The Old English songs were very realistic and splendidly interpreted. As the encore to this group Mr. Fanning sang in the most excellent style I have ever heard, the well-known "Kerry Dance," by Molloy, followed by a beautiful dream song.

The last group was the most varied of all, introducing the "Mammy's Song" which proved a great favorite and had to be repeated. "To Mary" was a fine number followed by the burlesque aria "The Mad Dog" from Liza Lehmann's opera, "The Vicar of Wakefield." The encores here were two of the most pleasing songs of the entire evening, two charming child songs, "Essay on a Camel" and "Thirsty Child."

Mr. Fanning's style is most pleasing, his interpretation broad in scope and his tones were exquisitely formed. They were rich and deep and pure, with an almost tenor-like clarity in the upper register.

Mr. Turpin's accompaniments were so excellent that the piano and voice seemed one perfectly combined instrument.

Constance Purdy Heard in Russian Songs.

Constance Purdy, the American contralto, gave a recital of Russian songs at the Women's University Club, New York, on Wednesday evening, December 9. Miss Purdy lived in Russia for several years, where she became a great lover of the Russian school of music, of its folksongs particularly, and she became imbued with the desire to familiarize her countrymen with all the weird beauties which characterize the music of this nation. On this occasion Miss Purdy, gowned in a quaint Russian costume, sang in the original the air from "Russalka," by Dargomijsky; "Daylight May Reign," Tschaikowsky; "Lullaby" and "The Pine Tree," by Balakirev; the air of the Shepherd Lehl from "Snegourochka," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "Vision" and two children's songs, by Moussorgsky; a folksong by Rachmaninoff, and "Rich and Poor," by Borodine. Prefacing each of these songs, Miss Purdy gave a few explanatory remarks and her translation of the poem, and, as she is a thorough student of Russian song and literature, these were necessarily interesting. She gave also Glazounov's "Drinking Song" in French, and her English numbers were "Pride" and a children's song, by Moussorgsky; "The Water Lily," by Rachmaninoff; "Hushed the Song of the Nightingale," Grechaninow, and "I Must Have Rejoicing," by Gliere.

Miss Purdy's excellent contralto voice and charming personality are coupled with an ability to express the meaning of the foreign words by the aid of facial expression and various tonal qualities to such a degree that, especially in the dialogues, the theme was not difficult to follow even by those who had no knowledge of the language.

Mabel Hammond was a skillful and sympathetic accompanist.

Zoellners at Andover, Mass.

The Zoellner String Quartet gave the first concert in the annual series of concerts at Abbot Academy, Andover, Mass., on Saturday afternoon, December 5. This is the thirty-sixth season of these concerts. The program, including works by Beethoven, Dvorak, Iwanow and Samazeuilh, a contemporary French composer, was most interesting, educationally and artistically.

ST. LOUIS JOTTINGS.

St. Louis, Mo., December 9, 1914.

The fourth symphony concert, December 4, opened with overture to "The Magic Flute," Mozart. The climax of the program was Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World." The soloist of the matinee was Mrs. David Kriegshaber, a popular local pianist (pupil of Victor Ehling, of this city), who performed in delightful fashion MacDowell's a minor concerto with the orchestra. Mrs. Kriegshaber possesses a brilliant technic, a clear musical conception, power and marvelous memory. She was recalled many times and responded by playing "Standchen," by Strauss. The orchestra closed with a Swedish rhapsody by Alfven, given for the first time in St. Louis. The Saturday evening program was a repetition of that given at the Friday matinee.

Sunday "Pop."

The fifth "Pop" concert was given by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, Sunday afternoon, December 6, to a capacity house. Two first time numbers were played, and were warmly received. Ludwig Pleier, first cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist of the afternoon, playing Popper's "Hungarian Fantasy." Mr. Pleier has a well grounded technic and good intonation. An encore was demanded and "The Minuet," by Becker, was rendered. Conductor Max Zach and his men played admirably.

The St. Louis Pageant Choral Society and Symphony Orchestra will give their second concert December 26, presenting "The Messiah," by Handel, assisted by Mrs. Franklyn Knight, the St. Louis contralto.

American Pianist Has Returned from Germany.

Among the many American artists who left Germany on account of the war is Edna Stoessel, pianist, who, after an extended stay of three years abroad, has returned to St. Louis. Her many appearances in Berlin and other cities in conjunction with her talented brother, Albert Stoessel, the concert violinist (now in Berlin), has given her prominence in the German musical world. She appeared in St. Louis, November 28, as the piano soloist of the first concert given by St. Louis Liederkranz Club. This talented young artist will appear in many recitals this winter.

Lichtenstein School of Music.

The Lichtenstein School of Music gave its second studio recital of the season in the Toy Theatre, Musical Art Building, December 8, assisted by the Violin Choir. The teachers of the school deserve much praise for the excellent work of the pupils.

Monday Club of Webster Groves.

Victor Lichtenstein, secretary of the American Guild of Violinists, gave a lecture, December 7, on the "Opera," for the Monday Club, in Webster Groves (a suburb of St. Louis), to a large and appreciative audience. Mr. Lichtenstein will give three sonata evenings with local pianists in January, February and March, to which events the St. Louis musicians are looking forward with pleasure.

Kroeger Organ Recital.

Ernest R. Kroeger gave an organ recital under the auspices of the Missouri Chapter, American Guild of Organists, Sunday, December 6, at the Church of the Messiah, assisted by Evelyn McGuire, contralto. Rosalind Sternberg Recital.

Rosalind Sternberg, a well known local singer, will give a program of "Chansonets en crinoline," this being the first time that this form of entertainment will have been given in St. Louis. Miss Sternberg is a product of the Taussig studio. Rodney Saylor will play piano solos by MacDowell and Liszt.

Rubinstein Musical Club.

The Rubinstein Musical Club commemorated the memory of Edward MacDowell, December 8. The program consisted of compositions by MacDowell, given by the following members: Mesdames Rudolph, Justison, Loughmiller, Harker, Thomson, Conner, Florence Miller, Magdalin Schifferle, Marguerite Peirce, Alla B. Ammerman, Icy Cobb and Courtney Werner and Ernest C. Krohn, Jr. Mrs. Ottmar Moll, president of the club, had the program in charge. A very large audience was in attendance.

Cale's Pupils' Recital.

The piano students of Mrs. C. A. Cale gave a recital, December 4, at the Calbany studio, 5716 Julian avenue, assisted by several of the voice students of the Principia Academy.

The Kirkwood Piano Club.

The members of the quintet are Ellis Levy, first violin; Chas. Allan Cale, second violin; Paul Rossow, viola; Edward Clay, cello; Rodney Saylor, piano. A very interesting program was performed. May Birdie Ditzler.

Fryer-Maitland Recital.

A recital was given by Herbert Fryer, the English pianist, assisted by Robert Maitland, baritone, at Aeolian Hall, New York, on Wednesday evening, December 9, at which the following program was given:

Andante and variations in F minor.....Haydn
Sonata in A flat, op. 110.....Beethoven
Songs—
An die Leyer.....Schubert
Die Krähe.....Schubert
Der Doppelgänger.....Schubert
Der Schiffer.....Schubert
Prometheus.....Schubert
Prelude, chorale and fugue.....César Franck
Sixteen waltzes, op. 39.....Brahms
Songs—
Bois Epais.....Lully
L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
Der Asra.....Rubinstein
Wer nie sein Brot.....Wolf
Der Tambour.....Wolf
Prelude, op. 43.....Chopin
Nocturne, E major, op. 62.....Chopin
Allegro de Concert, op. 46.....Chopin

Mr. Fryer showed himself to be a pianist of sterling qualities. He possesses a brilliant technic and his interpretations are unusually musicianly. His tone is warm and sonorous and his use of the pedal effective and never excessive. His playing was particularly brilliant in the Beethoven sonata, of which he gave a broad and dignified reading. He showed himself to be no less in touch with the spirit of the classical school in his fine rendering of the prelude, chorale and fugue by César Franck, in which he brought out fully the exaltation and almost religious fervor of the great Belgian composer. His reading of the Chopin compositions was delicate and full of sentiment without ever leaning to sentimentality, and the sixteen waltzes of Brahms gave him an opportunity to exhibit brightness and buoyancy as well as humor. His playing was warmly welcomed by the audience and he was forced to give several encores.

Mr. Maitland, by whom he was assisted, was suffering from a bad cold, but this was rarely noticeable and marred but little the excellent effect of his singing. He possesses a voice of fine quality, which he uses skillfully. His enunciation and emission are excellent and his tone never forced. His singing is at all times replete with beauty and feeling. This was especially so in the more dramatic of his selections; particularly in "Der Doppelgänger" of Schubert was the feeling finely brought out. His interpretation of the long and tragic "Prometheus" was masterly. His handling of compositions by modern composers was no less musicianly. The delicate sonority of his voice was especially noticeable in Reynaldo Hahn's "L'heure exquise," and his singing of the two Wolf songs showed his entire sympathy with this supreme master of the modern German Lied.

This recital was an undeniable success and introduced to the American public two artists of genuine worth who form a welcome addition to the music life of this country.

Although introducing himself as soloist, Mr. Fryer acted also as accompanist for the singer and in this capacity again proved himself a musician of unusual ability.

Eleanor Everest Freer Music.

Young Miss Freer, a senior at Bryn Mawr College, Philadelphia, daughter of Eleanor Everest Freer, of Chicago, is to sing a group of soprano solos at a Red Cross Society concert, Bryn Mawr College, December 19. The songs are by Brahms, Grieg, Godard, Diemer, and her own mother's "Sweet and Twenty." Miss Freer is said to be a very musical personality.

"What sort of a school is 'Leazer Tudwinker's niece goin' to, up to the city?"

"A Controversy of Music, I b'lieve they call it; she's learnin' to be a choir singer."—Puck.

What Is an American Composer?

Luxon Lodge, Harv[illegible]
England, November 24, 1914.

To The Musical Courier:

In your issue of October 28 I was much interested in a communication "What Is An American Composer?" by George E. Simpson, of Forth Worth, Tex. Being an American composer myself, though it is sixteen years since I have been in my native country, I have naturally thought a good deal on this subject, and have been not a little indignant at often finding myself classed by Americans among foreign musicians, while some foreigner who goes to America for a year or two is hailed pro tem. as an American composer. Such a state of affairs could exist in no European country. There seems to be some absurd idea that the stranger on the spot is more an American than the man who was born and bred there and his fathers before him.

Now take my own case. Is there a more American composer than myself? My ancestor, Alexander Shapleigh, went to America from England in 1637, settling in the New England States. I myself was born in Boston, and never left America until my student years were over. Is it possible for any one to be more American than I am? Yet because I do not use Indian or negro themes for my music and go about bragging about "God's Own Country" in a strong foreign accent, my claims pale in comparison with some recently naturalized citizen.

It is this state of things that often makes me feel like a man without a country. Even if I should be naturalized here in England, I should not be eligible for the benefits of my profession in this country, such being reserved for those who are "British born." On the other hand, take a recent prize competition for American composers, which was so very American that it was for all composers resident in the United States or Canada, thus excluding any truly American composer who might happen for the time being to be resident abroad. In discussing the matter with an ardently patriotic fellow countryman, he would not believe this was intended to be the case, so to settle the dispute I wrote to the committee, stating my own circumstances and asking if a composer in my position would be allowed to enter, and found that under the existing rules I would not. Yet this was a contest presumably to benefit the American composer.

So you see your correspondent from Fort Worth was quite right in all his statements, and you must continue to preach "America for the American musician" until Americans realize what it means to have a birthright. And until some American composer appears who can boast a longer American ancestry than mine, coupled with his own entire education being received in his native country, I shall claim the proud distinction of being the most American composer in the sense in which this phrase should be understood; for it is not the borrowing of Indian or negro themes, but the inborn tendencies and outlook inherited from generation to generation that will unconsciously evolve a national musical expression for America.

Trusting you can find a place in your columns for this letter,

Yours sincerely,
Bertram Shapleigh.

Roderick White's Teachers.

Any violinist who elects to exploit his art must have mastered the essentials of violin playing, that is, he must be first of all thoroughly equipped. It is not sufficient merely to chronicle the fact that he has ample technic, impeccable intonation, fleet fingers, and bow dexterity. Everyone who terms himself a violinist is expected to have these essentials at command, otherwise he cannot hope to discover the secret of violin playing which lies solely in the ability to transmute.

In order to be fully prepared for this step Roderick White, after his preliminary studies in America under Max Bendix, went to Europe and placed himself under the famous Belgian master, César Thompson, for the development of his left hand, inasmuch as this teacher specialized in the establishment of technic of high order and especially in double stopping. Having accomplished this purpose, Mr. White then sought the services of Leopold Auer for the development of style, bowing, repertoire, expression and general artistic expansion.

Mr. White was ready then for the next step—the injection of his own temperament into his work. Where neither personality nor temperament exists, no matter how technically perfect, the performance counts for little. In no other art is the old saying, "If we want to make others feel we must feel ourselves," more pertinent than in violin playing. This is the Alpha and Omega of music—to make it penetrate beyond the tympanum of the ear. Skill, therefore, is not an end but a means thereto. The amount of skill required for the proper interpretation of any composition is just enough to set forth that composition in the most perfect manner possible. The adjustment of his skill and his personality to this end has been Mr. White's chief work since leaving the Thompson and Auer folds.

NEWS FROM VARIOUS CITIES

Columbus.

Columbus, Ohio, December 9, 1914.

The past week has been so full of musical events that it has been almost impossible to attend every one. On Monday evening, November 23, Bert E. Williams gave a splendid organ recital in St. John's Church, which was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience, although by custom, applause was not countenanced. Mr. Williams was assisted by Linda Furniss, a young singer of great promise. Mr. Williams offers a pupil in recital at St. John's Church, December 9, Emma Lang, who is organist at St. Mathew's Lutheran Church. She has chosen a most interesting program, in which she will be assisted by Mrs. William C. Graham, soprano.

Franz Wilczek, violinist, has been a visitor in Columbus since November 30, and expects to remain here until after the holidays. It is very likely that Mr. Wilczek and his pupil, Helene Pugh, pianist, will be heard in recital soon. Last Sunday afternoon Miss Pugh invited a few friends to her home to meet her teacher, and during the afternoon Mr. Wilczek and Miss Pugh played the Goldmark suite for piano and violin.

A program of Yuletide music was given last evening, December 8, in Memorial Hall, under the auspices of the Women's Music Club. EMILY CHURCH BENHAM.

Dallas.

Dallas, Tex., December 8, 1914.

The Schubert Choral Club opened the musical season at the Dallas Opera House on November 23 with Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler as the artist. The first concert attracted a very large audience and gave every indication of an interesting season. The first number of the Schubert Club, "The Little Brown Bee," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, was pleasing. Later the club sang the Rubinstein-Harris "Persian Serenade" and the Schubert-Page "Ave Maria" with violin obligato, written by Julius Albert Jahn, of Dallas, and played by Marion Cameron Fielding. These numbers, directed by Harriet Bacon McDonald, showed careful training and were well received by the hearers. The program consisted of: "The Little Brown Bee" (Mrs. H. H. A. Beach), the Schubert Choral Club; "Moment Musical," No. 3, from op. 94 (Schubert), menuet, G major, No. 3, from six menuets (Beethoven), Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler; sonata, "Appassionata" (Beethoven), mazurka, op. 7, No. 1, etude, op. 10, No. 7, etude, op. 10, No. 12, valse, op. 64, No. 2, ballade, op. 52 (Chopin), Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler; "Persian Serenade" (Rubinstein-Harris), "Ave Maria" (Schubert-Page), the Schubert Choral Club; "Theme Varie, A major (Paderewski), etude de concert, op. 1, No. 1 (Schloezer), arabesque on themes of the waltz "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" (Strauss), arranged by Schulz-Evler, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler.

Andrea Sarto, the baritone, will appear in recital here Wednesday, December 9.

The Musical Art Society sang Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Sunday, November 22, at the Auditorium. The chorus was accompanied by the Bethany Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Haesener conducted. The Art Society is an organization of seventy-five voices and did most creditable work. Arvid Wallin sang the tenor solos with fine understanding and was never heard to better advantage. Miss Coover, soprano, sang her parts with good technic and clearness of tone. Especially was the "Inflamatus" well sung. Hazle Engle, who sang the second treble part, did so with great credit. She is the possessor of a rich musical voice. The bass solos were well delivered by George Ryden, the possessor of a rich voice. The accompaniment by the orchestra was all that could be desired and the organization can well be proud of its work.

A quartet has been organized, known as the Song Cycle Quartet. The members are: Edith Anderson, soprano; Arvid Wallin, tenor; Hazle Engle, contralto; Uly Woodside, baritone, and Roy Underwood, accompanist. The quartet will give its first concert December 11, and has chosen Cadman's "The Morning of the Year."

Cedar Rapids.

Cedar Rapids, Ia., November 18, 1914.

The regular midwinter course of concerts under the auspices of the Cedar Rapids Choral Union of Coe College has been announced, as follows: November 30, Florence Macbeth, coloratura soprano; January, Thuel Burnham, pianist; February, Mary Edith Gowans, contralto; March, Flonzaley Quartet; March, Evan Williams, tenor. ◈ ◈ ◈

Risser Patty has been engaged as director of the Coe College Conservatory of Music during the absence of Earle G. Killeen, who had planned to spend the year in Europe, but on account of the war will remain in New York. Mr. Patty was detained in Europe until late in the season and the great amount of work accumulated for him at the college on his return made it impracticable to begin the rehearsals of the Choral Union at the usual opening of the season. Announcement is now made that rehearsals will be resumed at an early date and plans are well under way for the next May festival, which will be held on the College Campus. The Russian Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Gadski have been already booked as the chief features.

A goodly number of Cedar Rapids music lovers visited Mt. Vernon, Saturday evening, October 31, when the Russian Symphony Orchestra, of New York, made its first appearance in this locality at the Cornell College Auditorium. The program included the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" symphony; andante cantabile for strings, by Tschaikowsky; praeludium, by Jaernfelt; "Dance of the Fairy Dolls," from "Nutcracker Suite," Tschaikowsky; "Swan Song," Saint-Saëns, and "Passe Pied," Gillet, and an extra number, "In a Cave," by Jranaw.

The special soloist of the evening was Marie Hoover Ellis, pianist, of Chicago. She played the Grieg piano concerto and proved to be an artist of superior worth, having recently completed four years of study with Leschetizky, after spending six years as a pupil of Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler. Her touch is lovely, sweet and singing, and aids materially in her interpretation, which was a revelation of new beauties in the composition. Her technic is strong and she plays with a sympathetic seriousness that establishes confidence at once.

If this concert may be taken as evidence, the appearance of this organization in the Coe College Festival next spring will meet with superlative success in pleasing all music lovers in Cedar Rapids and vicinity.

CHARLOTTE GREENE.

Louisville.

Louisville, Ky., November 27, 1914.

The principal musical event of the present week was the concert by Edith Rubel, the young violinist, at the Woman's Club on Tuesday night. Miss Rubel, recently returned from a course of study with Theodore Spiering in Germany, showed herself to be a rare mistress of her instrument, with a tone of surprising volume and beauty, and a poetical fund of interpretation remarkable in the variety of its scope. She carried her audience with her, appealing to its sympathies at one moment and rousing it to enthusiasm at the next. Her program was one to test the ability of a virtuoso, and included the Nardini E minor concerto, the Tartini G minor sonata, the Bruch G minor concerto, Handel's "Arioso," Mozart's menuet, Saint-Saëns' "Swan," the Wilhelmj arrangement of the "Prize Song," and Kreisler's "Schoen Rose Marin" and "Liebesfreud." Olive Robertson, at the piano, gave sympathetic support to the soloist. Miss Rubel is a Kentucky girl, but has made her home in New York for several years. She appeared under the local management of Harry Marx, who is offering a series of artist attractions to the Louisville concert goers, the first on the list being Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is to sing at the Masonic Theatre on December 2. Evan Williams and Fritz Kreisler follow in January and March.

K. W. D.

Lynchburg.

Lynchburg, Va., December 7, 1914.

Lynchburg music lovers were given a delightful treat at the Academy of Music Saturday night, when Emma Adams, of this city, presented Francis Rogers, baritone, in one of the most satisfying concerts with which the musical element has been regaled this season. Mr. Rogers has been heard in recital in Lynchburg before, his last appearance being with Mme. Sembrich several years ago, since which time he has attained great development in his art. His voice is one of unusual richness, and he exercises wonderful control over his vocal powers, while his personality is a notable force in giving his music effect. Notwithstanding the fact that the weather on the evening of his appearance here was about as unfavorable as J. Pluvius could dispense, a representative and highly cultured audience turned out to hear the recitalist.

The musical department of Randolph-Macon Woman's College has engaged Germaine Schnitzer, the Austrian pianist, to give a recital at the college on the evening of December 10.

JULIAN T. BABER.

Bay City.

Bay City, Mich., December 8, 1914.

The Thursday Musicale Club of Bay City is studying history of music, beginning with uncivilized and ancient music, including in the first period the primitive (among races that have not reached the point of artistic organization); second period, semi-civilized (people now existing, like Chinese, Hindus, etc., whose music has a real system, but without relation to our own); third period, ancient people (Egyptians, Assyrians and Hebrews, who seem to have been on a similar footing with that above); fourth period, civilized music, including early Christian and medieval development to 300 A.D. and so on up to the early nineteenth century. The officers of the club are: President, Mrs. Norris Wentworth; vice-president and corresponding secretary, Miss Gilbert; secretary-treasurer, Miss Hawthorne.

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 25. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1813.

WAR TIME MUSIC IN BUSY BERLIN.

Many Appropriate Works Given—American Violinist Heard and Liked in Belgian Music—Flesch Active—Opera Chorus in Oratorio—Bruch's Sons at the Front

BERLIN HAS PLENTIFUL SUPPLY OF CONCERTS AND OPERA.

Berlin W., Jenaer Str. 21,
November 20, 1914.

The public interest in hearing good music, particularly the German classics, has in no way abated since the season began. It is difficult to realize during my nightly wanderings through the Berlin concert halls that the greatest war in all history is in progress only a few hundred miles away.

Although the number of concerts is necessarily greatly diminished this season the quality of the musical offerings still continues to be of the very best, and occasionally we have an evening that even in point of the quantity of musical entertainments is quite like old times. For instance, on Sunday, November 15, the following list of operas and concerts was given:

1. Berlin Royal Opera, "Trovatore."
2. Charlottenburg Opera House, "Undine."
3. Philharmonie, Philharmanic popular concert.
4. Blüthner Hall, Matinée, Hausegger symphony concert.
5. Blüthner Hall, Evening, popular concert (Xaver Scharwenka soloist).
6. Beethoven Hall, Alexander Heinemann, Lieder recital.
7. Royal High School, male choir concert under R. Fiering.
8. Harmonium Hall, Hermann Schwartz, piano.

Hugo Kaun Works Heard.

Hugo Kaun has orchestrated his "Märkische Suite," which was originally written for two pianos. The work was presented to Berlin in its new garb at the second concert of the Blüthner Orchestra under Siegmund von Hausegger. In its orchestral garb the "Märkische Suite" is much more effective than in its original setting. The peculiar charms of the landscape beauty of the Mark Brandenburg, which inspired Kaun to write the suite, were impressively reflected in the three movements. He has caught the spirit of his native heath and reflected it in tones with a master hand. How beautiful is the evening mood, for instance, of the "Kloster Korin!" The novelty met with a pronounced success, and the composer, who was present, was called upon to bow in acknowledgment.

THE KAISER IN THE FIELD WITH GENERAL VON MOLTKE.

The other numbers of the program were the overture to Mendelssohn's "Sommernachtstraum" and the big C major symphony by Schubert.

Two other Kaun numbers for male choir were heard at the Philharmonie on Friday evening at a concert given by the Berlin Sängerverein "Caecilie Melodia" under the leadership of Max Eschke. The two numbers, which are entitled "Morgenlied" and "Morgenweihe," are grateful and effective and admirably written for the men's voices. "Morgenweihe" is dedicated to the Berlin Sängerverein. Both works were heartily applauded. Kaun's "Anakreontischer Lieder" for male chorus and also two lieder for sopranos were heard at this concert. Two beautiful numbers, well sung by the choir, were "Media Vita" for double chorus and "Friede den Schlummernden" by Max Bruch. The soloist of the evening was Elisabeth Ohlhoff, who made a very pleasing impression in two groups of Lieder.

Philharmonic Choir Concert.

Brahms' "Requiem" was the principal work performed at the second concert of the Philharmonic Chorus under Siegfried Ochs. It was given at the Philharmonie on Monday evening and repeated on Wednesday, which day was "Busstag" or the day of repentance. Siegfreid Ochs is very much en rapport with this wonderful choral composition. I never expect to hear it more impressively and more effectively given than was the case on Wednesday evening. The world-famed choir, which is unquestionably the best mixed chorus in existence, sang with wonderful finish and precision and with deep fervor and above all with wonderful dynamic effects. That master singer Johannes Meschaert quite held his own with the famous choir in the baritone solos, whereas the other two soloists fell a trifle short.

The "Requiem" was preceded by Bach's cantata, "Gott, der Herr, ist Sonn' und Schild," in which there are a couple of very beautiful choral numbers.

At the third concert of this series Anton Bruckner's Mass will be given its first performance in Berlin, and on the same evening a new choral composition entitled "Frieden" by E. N. von Reznicek will have its première.

THE GERMAN CROWN PRINCE WITH HIS STAFF.

Bohemian Quartet Plays.

The popular Bohemian String Quartet gave the first of a series of concerts on Friday evening, when it had the assistance of Teresa Carreño. The Schumann quintet, in which she was heard, proved to be the most effective and interesting number of the program. The variations from the "Kaiser" quartet by Hadyn, with which the four artists began, were recently played more convincingly by the Rosé Quartet from Vienna. Schubert's G major quartet, which followed, is not one of the master's most inspired works, but Smetana's "Aus meinem Leben," which brought the program to a close, has always been one of the most brilliant repertoire numbers of the Bohemians. They received a most enthusiastic reception.

An American Violinist.

Albert Stoessel, an American violinist, made a very successful debut on Saturday evening at Blüthner Hall. As an ensemble player Stoessel has already won his spurs in this city, having successfully made his entree last winter as the second violin in the Hess Quartet. This was, however, his first appearance as a soloist, and it was the first time that he had the opportunity to demonstrate to the Berlin public his remarkable command of the violin and his superior musicianship. Accompanied by the Blüthner Orchestra under the baton of Willy Hess, his teacher, he played three concertos—Gernsheim's first in D major, Spohr's eighth in A minor, (the "Gesangscence"), and Vieuxtemps' fifth in A minor. In choosing a work of the great Belgian composer-violinist the American in no way jeopardized his success in Berlin, for happily the Germans are not petty in such matters. Stoessel's clever musicianship, by the way, is revealed in some effective changes made in this concerto, particularly in the instrumentation.

Stoessel justly scored an emphatic success, for he is a very superior artist. His technical command of the violin is singularly complete. He has strong, sure, and fleet fingers. His intonation was impeccable, both in rapid passage work and in all kinds of double-stoppings. His manipulation of the bow is no less noteworthy, being smooth, pliable and energetic. Stoessel possesses that so necessary combination for the right arm—strength and flexibility. The Gernsheim concerto is not an original or effective work, but the young American played it so masterfully that it met with a very warm reception. The venerable composer, who was present, bowed his thanks in response to the hearty applause. Stoessel is a very fine Sphor player. I have not heard a more finished well rounded mature, and satisfying performance of the "Gesagscence" for many a season. The young artist, whose great natural gifts have been trained in one of the best of schools, promises brilliant things for the future. That remarkable all round musician Willy Hess supported his pupil with ideal accompaniments.

Flesch and Schnabel Draw.

Carl Flesch and Arthur Schnabel as ensemble players here have a drawing power which renders them immune from the disturbing influences caused by the war. Whereas most artists find it necessary to sing or play for the benefit of the Red Cross or some other War Relief Fund to draw out the public these two are in a position to depend on their artistic merits alone and still are sure of being greeted by a full house. Their second evening of Beethoven sonatas saw Beethoven Hall filled to the last seat, although the concert was not given for any charitable purpose. This is at it should be, for the sonata playing by Flesch and Schnabel is a thing apart, these two artists standing in this respect on a plane all by themselves. They played the three sonatas in A major, op. 12, No. 12; C minor, op. 30, No. 2, and G major, op. 30, No. 3.

Three Pianists Appear.

Three important pianists were heard during the week—Conrad Ansorge, Wilhelm Bachaus, and Waldemar Lütschg. Ansorge appeared at Blüthner Hall on Thursday, and played a program of Beethoven sonatas which comprised the opus numbers 10, 14, 81, 109 and 111, and closed with the big sonata in C minor, which is one of Ansorge's best numbers.

Bachaus played a Schumann program at Beethoven Hall on Tuesday. His concert was given for the benefit of the Caecilien-Hilfe, which is named after the Crown Princess, who attended the concert in person. The F sharp minor sonata might have been improved by greater breadth of conception and greater depth of feeling, but in the "Carneval" Bacchaus was in his element and played brilliantly. In his technical handling of the piano Bacchaus proves that he knows the secrets of relaxation. Such smooth easy passages are possible only when the arms are wholly relaxed. The concert was largely attended and much applause was showered on the concert giver.

Waldemar Lütschg, the Russian, like Ansorge, played a Beethoven program including the two most popular of all the Bethoven sonatas the "Appassionata" and the "Waldstein," also the sonata in A flat, op. 110, and the "Eroica" variations. Although he is a Russian Lütschg met with a warm reception. The large minded attitude of the public here in this respect is refreshing. A recital is to be given next week by Frederic Lamond, the Scotchman, who is a British subject. Lamond was recently taken prisoner together with all the other Englishmen in Berlin, but he has been released and is about to begin his public concert work it seems.

Lütschg is a Beethoven interpreter par excellence. He approached the master in a most reverential mood and his execution was of a superior order.

Opera Singers in Oratorio.

The chorus of the Berlin Royal Opera attempted the experiment of singing Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis"—by no means an easy task for a body of singers accustomed to the routine of opera work, for they were numerically neither strong enough nor was it possible to have the necessary rehearsing for so exacting a choral work. Nor is Hugo Rüdel, their conductor, a genius of the baton. But he is a very good drillmaster and the mass was given an acceptable performance. Memories of Siegfried Ochs and his unique chorus, however, arose, and comparisons were fatal. But Ochs and Rüdel are as day and night, and one cannot expect a chorus that is singing in operas every night to rival one that does nothing but sing oratorios and that after unlimited rehearsing.

Bruch's Sons in War.

I recently spent an afternoon with Max Bruch at his home in Friedenau. Both sons of the aged composer are in the army serving at the front in France. The elder son was one of the few in his company to escape unhurt in an attack on the French and English. Young Bruch saw his comrades mowed down like grass by the machine guns.

Arthur M. Abell.

Metropolitan Life Glee Club Concert.

A large audience assembled for the twentieth private concert of the Metropolitan Life Glee Club, Tuesday evening, December 15. It filled the spacious Assembly Hall of the Metropolitan Life Building, New York, which fact speaks well for the club's previous concerts.

Wilbur A. Luyster is the conductor of the club. The work on Tuesday evening of last week demonstrated what his wide experience as a director plus native ability is able to accomplish with non-professional singers, in the way of fine concerted singing, shading and diction. The numbers were: "Ode to March," G. Waring Stebbins sung with vigor; "Mammy's Lullaby," Spross, an arrangement from the Dvorák Humoresque, which illustrated fine harmony; the well shaded and markedly rhythmical Molloy's "The Kerry Dance," the Bruno Huhn "Invictus," which carried conviction; "The Shoogy Shoo," Ambrose; "The Lamp In the West," Parker; "Simple Simon," Macy (repeated) and "Hark! The Herald Angels Sing," an arrangement by J. W. Lerman.

Assisting the club were Mme. Buckhout, soprano; Gertrude Ina Robinson, harpist; Isolene Harvey, violinist, and John M. Cushing, accompanist.

Mme. Buckhout sang "Sweet Summer Goodbye," L. S. Collins; Polish "Niecesliva," M. Blaziejewicz; "His Valentine," Gilberté; "I Know," M. H. Brown; "You and I," Ward Stephens; "Ave Maria," Schubert; "Eternity" "Stances," Flegier, and the "Depuis le jour" aria from Charpentier's "Louise."

Isolene Harvey's violin solos were "Le Cygne," Saint-Saëns; Mazurka, Wieniawski; "Gypsy Dance," Nachez.

"Mazurka," Schnecker, was Miss Robinson's programed number, to which two encores were added.

The program was throughout interesting and enjoyable.

Reuben Davies Delights a Critical Audience.

Reuben Davies, the young American concert pianist, assisted by Ruth Hendrickson, soprano, gave a concert at the Christian Church, Mound City, Mo., on Friday evening, November 20, at which the following program was performed:

Piano, chaconne in D minor, Bach-Busoni; soprano, "Elsa's Dream" (Lohengrin); piano sonata, op. 2, No. 3, Beethoven; soprano, "Her Love Song," "Come to the Garden, Love," "Autumn Song," Mary Turner Salter; piano, "The March Wind," MacDowell; concert etude, MacDowell; "March Funebre," Chopin; "Polonaise in F minor" Chopin; soprano, "A Bowl of Roses," Clarke; "Valley of Laughter," Sanderson; "At Dawning," Cadman; "An Open Secret," Woodman; piano, "Concert valse in E major," Moszkowski; "Hungarian Rhapsodie," No. 2, Liszt.

The Mound City, Mo., News of December speaks as follows of this concert:

A very splendid concert was given by Reuben Davies, pianist, and Ruth Hendrickson, soprano, both of Atchison, Kan., at the Christian Church, Friday, November 20.

Mr. Davies filled a return engagement. . . . A very good audience greeted Mr. Davies' recital very enthusiastically. It was a splendid program from beginning to the end, and thoroughly satisfactory to the musicians present both from a technical and melodic standpoint. Mr. Davies gave evidence to the discrimination of growth during the interim of the two engagements. His playing was marked by evident sincerity of purpose and a fine comprehension of the composer's mood. Miss Hendrickson proved a very pleasant young lady with a pleasing voice. Her selections were well chosen.

Mr. Davies will play return engagements in Hiawatha, Kan., December 30, and in Everest, Kan., January 8, 1915.

John McCormack Buys Famous Violin.

The following appeared in the New York Times of December 12: "Chicago, Dec. 11.—There was a flurry of interest in musical circles today when it was announced that John McCormack, the tenor, had bought the 'Healy Strad' for $10,500. . . .

"The violin is one of the most coveted in America, and for several years has been held by Lyon & Healy for the coming of a purchaser who would pay the high price set upon it.

"The 'Healy Strad' was made by Stradivarius in 1711 for an Italian nobleman. The instrument remained in the possession of the nobleman's family until forty years ago, when it was brought to America. It was placed on sale a few years ago and bought by Lyon & Healy.

"McCormack also bought Paganini's favorite bow, declared by experts to be the finest in America, for $500."

MINNEAPOLIS REPORTS A VERY ACTIVE WEEK.

Musical Events Are Numerous in Twin City Preceding Holidays—An Interesting Sunday Afternoon Program by Symphony Orchestra—Thursday Musical Club News.

Minneapolis, Minn., December 15, 1914.

Last week was one of the busiest in the musical history of Minneapolis. This week every one is anticipating the holidays and so shopping is in vogue instead of concerts. The Minneapolis letter last week was so long that two concert reports were left for this week.

ARPI SWEDISH MALE CHORUS.

The concert given at the Emmanuel Lutheran Church by the Arpi Swedish Male Chorus was a splendid success. The singing shows steady improvement under the efficient leadership of Hjalmar Nilsson. The club was assisted by Wilma Anderson-Gilman, pianist, and her sister, Ruth Anderson, violinist.

THURSDAY MUSICAL CLUB.

The regular bimonthly meeting of the Thursday Musical Club was held in the First Baptist Church on December 3. Jean Adie played the "Tocatta and Fugue," Bach, for organ, and Francesca Bendeke, violinist, played the C major sonata of Mozart, with Kate Mork, pianist. Meta Fust Willoughby sang "Had I Jubal's Lyre," by Handel, and "Should He Upbraid," by Bishop. Elsa Jache played the Bach-Busoni chaconne for piano. Hazel Fleener sang a group of songs, and Tenie Murphy Sheehan and Jan Hal Griffee sang a duet from the opera "Le Nozze di Figaro."

The student section of the Thursday Musical Club held its meeting at the beautiful home of Mrs. James Falconer on December 9. Hazel Fleener sang a number of songs and the string section of the club furnished the instrumental music. A violin quartet, comprising Winifred Lind, Grace Workman, Alice Linkfield and little Mildred Ring, played four times during the afternoon, and received many compliments upon the excellent rendition of some of the arrangements like "Minuet," by Beethoven, "Largo," by Handel, etc. In the receiving line were Mrs. James Falconer, Mrs. Ry Smith (chairman), Agnes Erdall (vice-chairman), Catherine Nightengale (secretary), Frances Rogers (treasurer), and Nellie Bailie, counsellor of the student section.

MINNEAPOLIS STRING QUARTET.

Minneapolis music lovers have been so happy in hearing the Beethoven cycle that it was an added joy to hear the F major string quartet of the same composer played in an impeccable manner by the Minneapolis String Quartet at the Unitarian Church, December 9. The perfection of interpretation could only be attained by such artists as those who constitute this quartet—Richard Czerwonky, first violin; Frans Dicks, second violin; Karl Scheurer, viola, and Cornelius van Vliet, cello. The opening theme was beautifully played on the cello by Mr. van Vliet. The Czerwonky sonata for oboe and piano was played by Miss Dobyns at the piano, and Bruno Labate of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. This was beautifully handled and the composition shows the creative genius of Mr. Czerwonky.

The Brahms D major quintet for strings and clarinet was played by the quartet, assisted by Pierre Perrier, also of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra.

ORCHESTRAL SUNDAY CONCERT.

No more elaborate or varied program has ever been designed by Emil Oberhoffer than that given at the Auditorium on Sunday afternoon, December 13. Ten numbers were performed, including two never heard here before and one never played before at these concerts. The "Festspiel" polonaise of Alfen is a composition of great interest. Mr. Oberhoffer has been fortunate in securing the first hearings of so many compositions and especially those of this man, who is called the "Brahms of the North." The overture "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai, is always a favorite, and the "Lohengrin" prelude was accorded a fascinating rendition. The Liszt symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," has snap, and the Coleridge-Taylor rhapsodic dance, "The Bamboula," gave a glimpse into another world of music. A novelty—a trio for flute, oboe and clarinet—"Serenade," by Di Hailly—brought forth three new players who have done much toward bringing the woodwind section to a point well nigh to perfection. The flutist, Mr. de Lorenzo; the oboist, Mr. Labate, and the clarinetist, Pierre Perrier, claim unbounded respect of their high attainments on their respective instruments. Percy's "Mock Morris" was another number which gives great pleasure, and the Weingartner arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" closed the program.

The soloist of the day was Mary Ann Kaufman, soprano, who elected to sing "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin," "Vissi d'Arte" from Puccini's "La Tosca," and "One Fine Day" from Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

NORTHWESTERN CONSERVATORY NOTES.

On Tuesday at 11 o'clock at the Leamington Hotel, Anne Hughes, head of the Conservatory Public School Music Department, will address the associate section of the Thursday Musicale on the subject of "The significance of the young people's symphony concerts in the musical education of the city."

Several of the faculty of the Conservatory attended the farewell reception given Miss Evers, the president, by Stanley faculty and students on Tuesday afternoon, December 8. Miss Evers left the city on Thursday morning for California.

The first of a series of modern plays to be put on by Miss Bender's class in expression, was given on Wednesday afternoon, December 8, at the student hour. Those appearing in the cast were Lillian Weedum, Etna Barr, Dorothy Grosvenor, Ellen Garrison. The production was "Happiness," the play written by Hartley Manners for Laurette Taylor, in the leading role of "Peg o' My Heart." It is planned to give the play later at Pillsbury House.

A large audience was in attendance at the recital given on Saturday morning, December 12, by Ethel Alexander of the Conservatory piano department.

The Northwestern Repertory Players presented "The Three Chauffeurs" by Chatterson on Friday evening, December 11, in Conservatory Hall. The cast included Harry Holbrook, Florence Groth, George Wilson, Lowell Holmes, Alice Monette, Olive Knappen, Carrie Rolph, Minerva Burwell, Edna Marcott, Elsie Doelz, Imogene Hattenbach, Huldah Erickson, Leone Putney and Queenie McMurray. The second play of the series to be presented by the players will be "The Piper's Pay," which will be put on early in January. The players are under the direction of John Seaman Garns, head of the Conservatory dramatic school.

The lecture-recital given by David Patterson at Stanley Hall Assembly hour on Tuesday, December 8, included a program of national music and folkdances.

The second of a series of informal musicales to be given by Elizabeth Brown-Hawkins of the conservatory voice department took place on Thursday evening in studio 510. A program of solos, duets and trios was given by pupils of her class. Miss Gongle, of the Conservatory piano department, accompanied. RUTH ANDERSON.

PUPILS OF MRS. FREDERIC SNYDER, OF ST. PAUL, MINN., FROM THE VANNINI SCHOOL, SINGING IN THE RED CROSS BENEFIT, DECEMBER 18.

RECORD BREAKING AUDIENCES

Greeted the Philadelphia Orchestra upon each of its appearances on its recent Western tour, and in the case of each city a return engagement of the Orchestra was asked for and made for next year.

Not only were the audiences larger than any that have ever greeted this Orchestra, but the noticeable advance in the quality of the playing of this assembly of musicians was enthusiastically commented by the music critics, with the conductorship of Mr. Leopold Stokowski particularly singled out and praised.

From every standpoint was the entire Western visit of this Orchestra "a triumphal tour."

Anne Stevenson Pupils Progress.

Great enthusiasm is voiced by all pupils of the Anne Stevenson voice studios over the rapid and intelligent results of her classes in English diction, Italian, sight singing and dramatic action.

In February, French and German will be taken up in addition to the foregoing.

Pupils are fortunate to receive such valuable training as is given by Beatrice Collyer, Miss Stevenson's associate, in analysis, word coloring, dramatic values and interpretive detail, which are taught in a manner to give artistry and finish to the singer. The stage deportment of Miss Stevenson's pupils is noticeably that of experienced professionals.

Miss Collyer has a unique system, devised to eliminate self consciousness, and obtains satisfying results in this direction.

It is Miss Stevenson's aim to produce finished artists as to voice production, style, interpretation, stage presence and dramatic ability.

These classes are entirely free to Miss Stevenson's pupils.

Eleanor Spencer with Cincinnati Orchestra.

Following the overture came the Schumann concerto in A minor for piano and orchestra. . . . It was played in good style and with exceeding fluency by Elcanor Spencer, a pianist new to this public, but one who was well received. Miss Spencer possesses an even scale and pleasant tone. Her work is sane and well balanced. She has no mannerisms, but, on the contrary, a stage presence and dignity which wins approval. A sound artist and careful interpreter, Miss Spencer proved herself a valuable addition to the roster of acceptable soloists which this season is being presented by the Orchestra Association at the symphony concerts.—Cincinnati Times-Star, December 5, 1914.

The soloist of the afternoon was Eleanor Spencer, a young pianist. . . . She has a very facile technic, a sincere manner at the piano, a gracious personality and considerable force. . . . Her success was unmistakable with the majority of the audience.—The Enquirer, Cincinnati, December 5, 1914.

With the personal charm that graces Miss Spencer's personality she combines an eminent knowledge and a thorough artistic education. Her art is to her like something divine; she does not want to startle her audience with technical tricks, but she appeals in her playing to the heart and soul. The artist proved this in the choice of her solo, the Schumann concerto. . . .

Miss Spencer bore testimony in her rendering of this composition to her indisputable admiration of Schumann, for she played the concerto with a veritably fascinating intensity; she brought out the spirit of true fervor which she involuntarily imparted to her audience. . . . The public did not cease its applause until Miss Spencer consented to give an encore, a Chopin etude, which was accorded the same enthusiastic reception.—Volksblatt, Cincinnati, Ohio, December 5, 1914.

. . . Although Miss Spencer came to Cincinnati a total stranger, musically speaking, she at once won her way into public esteem and regard by her masterly as well as artistic performance of the concerto.

Miss Spencer is still very young, but she plays with a maturity and poise which a much older performer might envy. Her touch is powerful and virile, almost masculine in its strength, yet is by no means disdainful of softer effects, as it possesses a poetic and feminine side which gives a balance and artistic unity to her performance. A singing touch, clean-cut phrasing and a well developed and resourceful technic constitute a mechanical equipment which she properly subordinates to the more important one of interpretation.

The Schumann concerto, . . . Miss Spencer in reading it announced its melodious theme and gracious and pleasing passages with fine taste and feeling. She proved herself one of the most satisfying artists who have appeared in Cincinnati for a long while.

After a most enthusiastic applause she responded with a Chopin etude.—Commercial Tribune, Cincinnati, Ohio, December 5, 1914.

CINCINNATI ORCHESTRA IN POPULAR CONCERT.

Second Sunday Afternoon Program Splendidly Performed by Dr. Kunwald and His Players —Orpheus Club Opens Its Season—Century Opera Coming in February— Other Events of the Week.

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 16, 1914.

The second popular concert by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Ernst Kunwald, last Sunday afternoon in Music Hall, was rather more serious than such concerts go. The first half of the program was given over to the overture "Prometheus," which Beethoven wrote for the allegorical ballet of the same name, the "Ride of the Valkyries" and "Wotan's Farewell" by Wagner. The Wagnerian numbers have become familiar even to the most casual concert goer by frequent repetition and they achieved an instant success. Works of a lighter nature formed the second half of the program, viz., Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresque," which the orchestra played superbly; a Grieg novelty, "Herzwunden"; a lovely morceau for strings only; "Ball Scene," by Hellmesberger; a very effective "solo for all violins," in which the beauty of the string choir of the Cincinnati Orchestra was evident, and a Strauss waltz, "Tausend und eine Nacht." Nicholas Kouloukis, principal flutist of the orchestra, was the soloist, playing Mozart's concerto, No. 2, in D major for flute and orchestra. The perfection of Mr. Kouloukis' playing revealed unsuspected possibilities in the flute as a solo instrument. The concerto is a very graceful and beautiful work, and Mr. Kouloukis' clarity of tone and perfect technic were evidently appreciated by the large audience that insistently demanded an encore. The intricate cadenza which Mr. Kouloukis added to the concerto is his own work.

CARL FRIEDBERG'S PIANO RECITAL.

Carl Friedberg, who appeared with such success with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra earlier in the season, gave a piano recital last Wednesday night in Memorial Hall, winning a signal triumph that has established him firmly in the favor of all music loving Cincinnatians. Mr. Friedberg elected to play a number of the less frequently heard works of Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Chopin, and his masterly readings were a rare treat indeed to those who were fortunate enough to hear him.

MACDOWELL SOCIETY'S PROGRAM.

The Cincinnati MacDowell Society gave a program from the works of its musical and literary section last Thursday night at Conservatory Hall. Among the Cincinnati composers represented were Paul Bliss (whose work is well known), George Leighton, Louis Victor Saar, Augustus Palm and P. A. Tirindelli. After the concert Miss Baur, directress of the Conservatory of Music, entertained the "MacDowellites" at an informal reception, where congratulations were showered on the writers and musicians.

INTERESTING SONG RECITAL.

A song recital of more than ordinary interest was that of Louise Ficker-Wagner Friday night at the Sinton Hotel. Miss Wagner is a native Cincinnatian and received a warm welcome home from her studies in New York. The audience was a large and appreciative one, and the enthusiasm unbounded. Miss Wagner is essentially a dramatic soprano and opera would seem to be her legitimate sphere. The program, which included the "Leise, Leise" aria from "Freischütz"; a group of Schubert and Schumann; "Verborgenheit," by Wolf, and two groups of modern songs, were artistically given. Antoinette Humphreys Smith added to the success of the evening by her sympathetic accompaniments.

ORPHEUS CLUB OPENS SEASON.

The Orpheus Club, Edwin W. Glover, director, opened its season auspiciously, December 3, at Emery Auditorium. The chorus, composed exclusively of male voices, shows the results of Mr. Glover's splendid training, and sang the various numbers in good style and with perfect unison. Reed Miller was the soloist for the opening concert.

CENTURY OPERA COMPANY COMING.

Cincinnati is to have opera after all. Although neither the Metropolitan or Chicago Opera Companies will visit this city this season, a small company of public spirited men have arranged to bring the Century Opera Company for a week, beginning February 1, when Cincinnatians will have an opportunity to hear operas in English given by a capable company at Music Hall.

MATINEE MUSICALE.

An artist recital by the Matinee Musicale is always an event of importance. That of Tuesday morning, the formal opening of the club's season at the Hotel Gibson, was more than usually interesting in that it introduced to the local public two artists who had not been heard here—Cornelius van Vliet, cellist, and Elisabeth van Endert, lyric soprano, from the Berlin Royal Opera. Superlatives seem the thing when writing or speaking of Cornelius van Vliet. The beauty of his tone, broad, round and warm; the exquisite artistry of his playing; the deli-

We hear much regarding the "soul" of the piano. Whether this "soul" is found in the soundboard or the action, or in the combination of both, is fully described in literature prepared by Kranich & Bach. It is well to know something about the grand piano, if one is going to purchase one. Study the claims of the Kranich & Bach, which present many inventions that place these instruments in a position strictly individual.

cacy of his pianissimo, and his finished style, mark an artist such as has not been heard here within the present writer's memory. Mr. van Vliet also revealed, in the choice of his numbers, the fact that there are many beautiful compositions for the cello, quite as poetic and emotional as any in all musical literature. He played a sonate by Valentini; "Elegie," by Schravezande; "Polonaise Fantastique," by Jeral; two MacDowell numbers, "A Deserted Farm" and "To a Water Lily," and a tarantelle by Popper. Among his several encores one stood out by sheer beauty of tone and nuance, Bohm's "Stille Wie de Nacht."

Mme. van Endert took the place, at the last moment, of Emilio de Gogorza, who took the place of Julia Culp. Finding that neither of these two artists could appear, Mrs. Adolph Hahn, the efficient president of the club, engaged Mme. van Endert at a moment's notice. Mme. van Endert sang a group of Schumann, two old English ballads, two MacDowell numbers, and a group composed of selections from Max Reger and Richard Strauss. The president and executive board of the Matinee Musicale received many congratulations on their choice of artists.

CINCINNATI CONSERVATORY CONCERT.

Three capable young musicians, Ralph Weil, pianist; Philip Dreifus, violinist, and Leonard Watson, cellist, earned the warm commendation of a large audience at the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music in an evening of chamber music last Tuesday. The concert givers are members of the ensemble class of Bernard Strum, and have the further ties of being members of the Sinfonia. The program held the Beethoven sonata for piano and violin, op. 2; that for the same instruments by Grieg, op. 8, and the Gade trio, op. 42, in which the Messrs. Weil and Dreifus were joined by the young cellist, Leonard Watson. The responsiveness of a large audience testified to the ability of the young musicians by abundant applause, spurring them on to their best efforts for subsequent concerts.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Another Oratorio Society Encomium.

In connection with Louis Koemmenich's conducting of the New York Oratorio Society's performance of Elgar's "The Dream of Gerontius," at Carnegie Hall on December 9, the following notice from the New York Evening Post of December 10 is probably one of the best accounts of the work of the society under the direction of its conductor that has been published in the daily press. Attention is called particularly to the account of the singing of Mildred Potter, an American artist whose work has always been of such a character as to bring forth praise wherever she has appeared:

"Last night's performance of Elgar's "The Dream of Gerontius," by the Oratorio Society and New York Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Louis Koemmenich, set a new standard for choral singing in New York. The visits of the Toronto Choir showed what can be done in sheer tonal beauty, and now Mr. Koemmenich has added the one great quality, emotionality; the choir of the Oratorio Society now has a soul. Mr. Koemmenich's most sanguine friends could not have hoped to hear such results in so short a time, and despite the fine work done last season, the audience was unprepared for such a superb performance.

"The improvement in tone quality is particularly noticeable in the tenor section, which sang like a highly trained soloist. The tremendous technical difficulties of the score were given with satisfying mastery. To one who did not know the work there were no difficulties. What a delight it was to hear the trebles attack their highest notes with the certainty of a concert master, and the quality of a solo violin. The sodden top notes of former years have been replaced with round, brilliant, and vital head tones. The altos have kept pace with their sisters, and their tone has the warm contralto throb that reaches the heart. The basses did not have so far to go as the other sections, but they also have advanced. There was a diapason sonority without gruffness, and better than this, there was perfect intonation. But it is unnecessary to speak of the different sections; they have been welded into a unified body that will bear comparison with any choir in the world.

"It is difficult to imagine a finer trio of soloists than that heard last night. The brunt of the work fell upon Gervase Elwes, and his performance left absolutely nothing to be desired. A well schooled voice always on key, perfect diction which made the maligned English language sound as fluent as Italian, and a musical and dramatic interpretative intelligence of the highest order, make him the foremost oratorio tenor in the world. When here last his singing lacked warmth. Last night it had everything. He is today a worthy successor of Sims Reeves.

"No American artist has grown as rapidly as Miss Potter, and there is no singer who can equal her in the task she had last night. There was a transcendental quality in her art that made the listener forget the singer and see beyond the sky. She has more than fulfilled her promise, and bids fair to do things that will make the stories told of the great singers in the past credible. . . .

"The orchestra of the Symphony Society played superbly. The prelude and interludes were delightful and the accompaniments perfect. Conductor, choir, orchestra, soloists, and audience combined to make the first concert of the Oratorio Society a completely satisfying evening and a great achievement."

An Allentown Concert.

Allentown, Pa., has a Euterpean Club-Oratorio Society, E. B. Kocher, conductor, which gave a notable concert of works by Elgar, Tschaikowsky, Bantock and Nagler, in the Lyric Theatre, Wednesday evening, December 9.

The American String Quartet assisted.

In the columns of the local newspaper, The Leader, December 10, appeared this review of the performance:

The Euterpean Club Oratorio Society last evening rounded out its twenty-fifth season by presenting at the Lyric Theatre, the forty-fourth concert of its career.

E. B. Kocher, the conductor, had his choral forces well in hand, the singing showing evidence of the most careful study and training. The program was well balanced, as usual, the numbers at the fall concert consisting of part songs and choruses. Foremost among the work of the societies was a sad wailing number, "Emer's Lament for Cuchulan," which was one of their best efforts. Sung with splendid effect was the massive chorus, "A Song in Praise of the Lord of Heaven and Earth," an ancient spiritual folksong by Franciscus Nagler, in which intonation, shading and interpretation were perfect. The societies rendered several part songs, including "Happy Eyes" and "The Shower," both by Elgar, and Tschaikowsky's beautiful version of "Night." Taken all in all, they never sang better and the local music lovers who had gathered to hear the concert were delighted at the progress in Mr. Kocher's work.

Harold Marks, the accompanist for the societies, presided at the piano, a Mason & Hamlin from the Aschbach warerooms. Mr. Marks is also organist of St. John's Lutheran Church, having succeeded his late lamented father, Dr. Clement A. Marks, in that capacity.

The business affairs of the concert were, as usual, attended with complete and conscientious detail by that experienced veteran member of the societies and lover of music, Joe H. Hart.

Freer Songs Sung.

"How Many Times Do I Love Thee?" by Eleanor Everest Freer (who is becoming known as an international composer, inasmuch as her songs are sung in Germany to German text as well as in America), was sung by A. Ray Carpenter in the artists' series of auditorium recitals, International College of Music and Expression, Chicago, Ill., December 11. One who heard the song says, in a notation on the program, "Splendid voice, splendid singer, and splendid song."

Mrs. Brocks-Oetteking Opens Studio.

Johanna Brocks-Oetteking has opened her vocal studio at 604 West 135th street, New York, where she is receiving pupils.

Mrs. Brocks-Oetteking makes a specialty of the correction of badly placed voices. As she is a lieder and oratorio singer, her experience in these departments should be of benefit to her pupils. She has some splendid testimonials from well known musicians in Europe.

Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

"ANTHOLOGY OF GERMAN PIANO MUSIC," Vol. II, Modern Composers, edited by Moritz Moskowski.

This volume is in style and appearance like Vol. I, and of about the samc degree of difficulty. The word "German" is rather freely applied to the Hungarian Hummel. the Austrian Schubert, the two Swiss composers, Thalberg and Raff, and the Slavonic Scharwenkas, Philipp and Xaver. Moszkowski himself is more a German de jure than de facto. Setting aside political considerations, however, it is allowable to classify as Germans the following composers who are German in musical style in the broadest sense of the word:

Hummel, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Thalberg, Henselt, Heller, Raff, Brahms, Jensen, Rheinberger, Philipp Scharwenka, Xaver Scharwenka, Moszkowski, Richard Strauss, Max Reger.

This collection contains for the most part short and other less important works of the composers represented. It is a valuable supplement to the pianist's library which probably contains all the longer and more important works omitted from this volume.

The Anthology of German Piano Music is one of the volumes of the Musicians' Library.

"FIVE VIGNETTES," for the piano, composed by F. Morris Class.

These lyrical pieces are elaborate only in their harmonic changes. The composer has managed to express himself without making his compositions difficult to play. They are available to anyone who has enough technic to play "Einsame Blumen" and "Herberec" in Schumann's "Waldscenen," which they resemble in a technical, though not in a musical manncr. There is a constant demand on the part of the public for just such short, comparatively easy, and modern piano pieces in album form.

FIFTH SERIES OF COMPOSITIONS FOR VIOLIN AND PIANO.

Among the works newly issued or re-issued under this heading are: Charles Wakefield Cadman's poetic and tender melody "Indian Summer," transcribed by Karl Rissland; Luigi Boccherini's famous old minuet, transcribed by Maude Powell; William Dichmont's melodious and sentimental "Thinking of You;" J. C. Bartlett's emotional "A Dream," transcribed by Karl Rissland; H. Engelmann's melodious "Gavotte" arranged by William Dressler; J. C. Macy's pretty slumber song, "Good Night, Little Girl, Good Night," transcribed by Karl Rissland; and the difficult and showy "Andante" from the second violin concerto by Henri Vieuxtemps.

TWO EASY AND INSTRUCTIVE STRING QUARTET MOVEMENTS:

"MADRIGAL," SCHERZO," by William Comerford Bowden.

These are admirable little pieces for students and amateurs. It is a pity there are not more compositions and arrangements of this length and grade of difficulty for string players with little technical skill. It is to be hoped that the Oliver Ditson Company will get the support from the public that this experiment warrants.

"Clarinet Solos" with piano accompaniment. There are seven numbers at present published in this series. They are popular in style rather than classical, but are not cheap or vulgar. Some of them are difficult:

Grand Fantasie on "Dixie".....Fred Luscomb
"The Fairy Boy," Irish air and variations...R. Gruenwald
Concertino in E flat.....R. Gruenwald
Grand Caprice.....H. Chrétien
Theme and Variations.....J. W. Kalliwoda
"Shower of Gold".....P. Bouillon
"Le Tourbillon".....P. Bouillon

"MANDOLIN ORCHESTRA MUSIC."

TWO IMPROMPTUS. "SERENADE," "WALTZ," for piano solo, by Arthur Nevin.

These may justly be described as pretty. They are of that pleasing and euphonious class of music known as "Salon," of which kind Schuloff, Godard, Leybach, Sidney Smith, and others better and worse, have published so much. It consists of concords mostly, plenty of melody, and passages that sound effective without being difficult to play. There ought to be considerable demand for these graceful and well written impromptus.

FOUR SONGS. By Robert Browning, taken from "Pippa Passes" and "Dramatic Lyrics," set to music for solo voice and piano accompaniment, by Emiliano Renaud.

The composer of these high-class art songs has certainly made no concessions to the popular taste. Nor has he had any respect for the limited technical skill of the amateur accompanist. Only singers of experience and pianist of considerable skill need hope to do justice to these songs. They belong entirely to recital programs by artists. When they are properly interpreted by artists who can do justice not only to the notes but to the emotional contents of these songs they will make their due effect. But even then there is a certain austerity in the music corresponding to the peculiar Browning flavor in the lyrics which will forever prevent these songs, excellent though they may be, from becoming popular. The names of the songs are: "All's Right With the World," "You'll Love Me Yet," "My Star," "Love Me Forever."

Haarlem Philharmonic Concert.

Oscar Seagle, baritone, and Henriette Bach, violinist, furnished the second musicale program of the Haarlem Philharmonic Society in the Astor Galley, Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, Thursday morning, December 17. Frank Bibb accompanied Mr. Seagle and George Falkenstein acted in a similar capacity for Miss Bach.

Finesse, always a notable characteristic of Mr. Seagle's singing, was evident in every number. He gave first a convincing delivery of the Verdi aria from "The Masked Ball," "Eri tu."

French was the language of the second group. "Deux Chansons Françaises" from the sixteenth century, "Serenade Italienne," Chausson; "Enfant si j'étais roi," Cui, delivered with truly French subtlety; "Ständchen," Schumann; "Alte-Liebe" and "Botschaft," Brahms, were the German offerings and the final group, by American composers with the exception of the delightful Old Irish "Ballynure Ballad," which had to be repeated, were Carpenter's; "When I Bring You Colored Toys;" Kernochan's weird "Smuggler's Song;" and Frank Bibbs' jubilant "Rondel of Spring."

Mr. Seagle's excellent baritone and refined art gave evident satisfaction to the members of the club, judging from the amount of applause.

Henriette Bach was likewise well received. A Gluck "Melody" and Mozart "Rondo" comprised her first group; Vieuxtemps' "Adagio Religioso," and Elgar's "La Capricieuse" stood together for the second group and three Kreisler numbers formed the third. These were "Minuet," Porpora, "Liebeslied," "Caprice," Wieniawski.

Easy, fluent technic, sure tone and poetic insight accompanied Miss Bach's numbers, each of which was thoroughly enjoyable.

Marion Green Pleases Arion President.

Marion Green, the American basso-cantante, recently appeared with the Arion Male Chorus of St. Louis; he is the first artist to be called to this club more than once, and it will be seen by the following letter that he will probably be called again:

Marion Green, Chicago:

MY DEAR MR. GREEN: I want to take this opportunity to tell you that we have never had an artist appear before our club who has been more thoroughly enjoyed, or who has given more general satisfaction than did you on your recent appearance with us. Your press notices were exceedingly flattering and I speak for the club when I say that we look forward to the time when we may have you with us for the third time.

With best wishes, I am, Cordially yours,

SCHUBERT GLEE CLUB GIVES DELIGHTFUL CONCERT.

Over One Thousand Music Lovers Attend First Concert This Season of Prominent Choral Society—Festival Chorus Holds Third Rehearsal—Music Notes.

Jersey City, N. J., December 17, 1914.

The Schubert Glee Club's first concert this season, given in the large auditorium of the Dickinson High School, under the direction of its new conductor, Roy K. Falconer, was an unqualified success. An audience of more than one thousand music lovers defied the stormy weather in order to listen to the singing of this popular organization. Assisting on the program as soloist was Frank Croxton, bass, and the Marsh String Quartet.

Mr. Falconer is an energetic, painstaking and serious musician, and under his directorship the club has improved in a marked degree. The attack, finish and shading in the choruses made the singing a real pleasure to the listener. The applause was genuine and prolonged, and a rather uncommon occurrence with chorus singing, three of the songs had to be repeated at the insistence of the audience. The program was an excellent one, selected to display the best quality in each part as well as ensemble work. Mr. Croxton was heard in several selections included in a group of Shakespearean and traditional songs, and also the incidental solo with the club, and he responded to several encores.

The Marsh String Quartet was accorded a warm and well merited welcome upon its second appearance in Jersey City. Mr. Marsh also gave two delightful violin numbers. Charles A. Prince was the accompanist for Mr. Croxton and Oscar Fyrberg for the club.

The newly elected officers of the club are: Dr. Gordon K. Dickinson, president; John C. Inwright, first vice-president; Edward Blanchard, treasurer; Frank A. Williamson, financial secretary; Clifford S. Kingsland, secretary.

The Jersey City Festival Chorus held its third weekly rehearsal last Thursday evening, December 17. In spite of the fact that the majority of the members are especially busy just at this time in preparation for Christmas and New Year festivities, a good sized number of members attended. The various choral works were rehearsed and studied carefully, all taking up the work with marked enthusiasm.

On account of Christmas Eve and New Year's Eve both falling on a Thursday evening this year, it has been decided to discontinue the rehearsals until January 7, when a full attendance of 300 to 400 members is expected. The weekly rehearsals will be continued in the Lincoln High School as heretofore.

Jersey City members who would like to continue their work through the holidays are invited to attend the Newark rehearsals. The Newark chorus will rehearse every Wednesday evening in the Central High School that city.

MUSIC NOTES.

Mabelle M. Sniffen, whose name was unintentionally omitted in the notice of the Musicians' Society reception and musicale last Friday evening, was the pianist for the occasion. She is organist and choir director of Simpson M. E. Church, and was formerly a pupil of Moritz E. Schwarz and Gustave Becker and is one of the advisory committee of the Jersey City Festival Chorus.

For information about notices, etc., for the MUSICAL COURIER, address the correspondent, Jessie Bruce Lockhart, 17 Brinkerhoff street.

Rudolph Ganz in San Francisco.

Pianists like Rudolph Ganz are milestones on the road of our musical education. The Switzer gave a recital yesterday afternoon in Scottish Rite Hall, and it is safe to prophesy that when next Saturday arrives, cultivated San Franciscans will be elbowing one another in their eagerness to hear him.

Ganz is what Nietzsche would call an Apollonian; he is an artist in whose mind all is order, good taste and delicate nuance. . . . Ganz can liberate the pianistic thunders at need and he did so with splendid effect in Liszt's version of the "Rakoczy" march, which he played with such a verve that, if there were any Magyars present, their nerves must have trembled with pride of race. . . . He affects a Ciceronian orderliness and beauty of phrase rather than the whirlwind and ecstasy of a pianistic Pindar. I can imagine the Bach chaconne, for instance, interpreted by Busoni, to whom we are indebted for the arrangement for piano, with an improvisational passion widely contrasting with the mood of poetic revery in which Mr. Ganz conceived it. But an artist has a right to be judged from his own viewpoint, and, for me, the exquisite subjectivity of Ganz's art was a sheer delight. He played us two sonatas, the lovely Viennese work of Haydn in D major, and the impassioned romantic composition of Chopin in B minor. Few artists play Haydn nowadays. His melodic purity and ingenuousness are a severe test for our modern impressionists. Ganz makes those joyous themes sing and dance. He is master, too, of that elegiac strain which Chopin borrowed from Vincenzio Bellini. The largo was a notable example of pure singing tone. The group of smaller works included a lovely example of Orientalise, "In the Garden of Old Serail," by Blanchet; the "Elves' Dance" of that precocious lad, Eric Korngold, and the "Mignon's Lied" of Liszt, likewise a couple of numbers of his own composition, delightful pages, all of them, in the chapter of the afternoon's experiences.—San Francisco Examiner, November 9, 1914. Von Ende Music School Events.

Three recital programs by pupils of various grades of advancement, studying at the von Ende School of Music, New York, have been given within the past week. At the first recital, December 11, pianists, singers and violinists participated in a program of nine numbers. Those who took part were: Ethel Lehr, Beatrice Ragsdale, Mildred Keightley, Helen Vogel, Mrs. J. A. Mellish, Emanuel Balabon, Max Smalzman, Max Olanoff, Michael DeTrinis, with Margery Morrison at the piano.

Friday evening, December 18, an advanced students' recital took place, in which the singing department was especially well represented.

Saturday afternoon, December 19, the junior students of the school had opportunity to show their ability. These young pupils range in age from seven to fourteen years.

Mme. Arctowska's Song Recital.

Mme. Arctowska, American born and wife of a Polish scientist, formerly court singer in Belgium, was heard in an invitation recital at the studio of William Howard Hart, New York, December 17. She sang three seventeenth century English songs, a group of German songs and another in French. Mrs. William Fink was at the piano. The perfect repose, dramatic expression and appropriate interpretation of the singer were noticeable in all she did. Exquisite was her singing of Hahn's "L'Heure," and very beautiful was Berlioz's "L'Absence." She also sang a number of songs made especially familiar to New York audiences by Heinrich Meyn, such as "Il neige" and "Le Soleil." The audience of invited guests enjoyed meeting this finished and highly artistic singer.

VIOLINIST

"He proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach Chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition and the three dances were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish."

—K. C. B. in Boston Daily Advertiser, Nov. 7, 1914.

Mme. Valda Opens School Here.

Giulia Valda the head of the Lamperti-Valda school of singing of 61 avenue Niel, Paris, has arrived in New York, and has located at No. 8 West Fifty-second street, where she will teach. Mme. Valda has brought with her a number of the students of her Paris school. It is owing to the European war that the Lamperti-Valda school is temporarily transferred to the American metropolis.

Kreidler Is Singing in Concert.

Louis Kreidler, the popular baritone of the Century Opera Company, in connection with his operatic duties, is devoting some of his time to concert work. On December 28 he will be the soloist with the Harvester Choral Society in Orchestra Hall, Chicago, and on January 11 with the Lakeview Musical Society, also of Chicago.

WASHINGTON NOTES.

1619 R Street, N. W.,
'Phone, N. 935,
Washington, D. C., December 10, 1914.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard Tuesday, December 1, in its second local concert this season, when the following program was given: Symphonic fantasia, "From Italy," Strauss; concerto in G major, No. 4, for piano, op. 58, Beethoven; overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Beethoven. Deep appreciation was shown for the playing of the soloist, Harold Bauer.

The belief of T. Arthur Smith that Washington is musical in the truest sense has caused him again to bring the Flonzaley Quartet for a series of concerts. The concert last Saturday afternoon was absolutely the last word in musical enjoyment.

Louise Homer appeared in concert last Friday afternoon, December 4, at the New National Theatre. This was the third event in a series that Katie Wilson-Greene is managing this winter.

Under the management of Mrs. Charles Stuart Alden and the patronage of the Countess Dumas and a goodly portion of society, a costume concert was given last Thursday evening at the Maison Rauscher for the benefit of the Belgian sufferers, which was exceptional in merit; it was a concert given by artists equal to any concert stage. The playing of Felix Garziglia was a treat rarely granted the Washington public, as his time is filled with the large classes in piano which he teaches in several Washington schools; while the beautiful voice of Helen Donohue DeYo in the song cycle by Frederick Knight Logan proclaimed the finished artist. Mrs. DeYo was dressed in Moorish costume of great beauty, which added to the effect of this fine song cycle. After great insistence on the part of the audience. Mrs. DeYo sang as encore the dainty little song, "Fairy Pipers." Adrienne Kirkman Wentz, a pupil of Mrs. DeYo, in Louis XVI costume; Marguerite O'Toole, harpist, in Grecian costume; Mme. DeGuerin Kittridge, in Renaissance costume, and Richard Backing, tenor, with Harry Wheaton Howard at the piano, added greatly to the success of the concert.

LATER WASHINGTON NEWS.

December 17, 1914.

"America's greatest singer," David Bispham, gave a song recital in English, at the Columbia Theatre, Friday, December 11, which proved justifiable the caption, quoted from the program.

The concert this Tuesday afternoon, December 15, by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist, was one of the most enjoyable given in Washington this winter. The beloved contralto is still the great singer with a big message for the people.

Heinrich Hammer has his studio this winter in the Old Washington Club Building in I street, which will make it more convenient for his pupils from resident and diplomatic circles. Mr. Hammer, being an authority, his classes in harmony made rapid progress last year, and have resumed their work.

The Washington College of Music is rapidly enlarging its faculty and scope, as the personal popularity of its president, Sam M. Fabian, and his corps of assistant teachers has long been established in Washington. On Thursday evenings each week, Mr. Fabian keeps "open house" in his residence studio, and one is assured of hearing some good music there. DICK ROOT.

"Messiah" Concerts, December 29 and 30.

In Steinway Hall, New York, forty years ago, (December 25, 1874), the Oratorio Society of New York sang Handel's "Messiah" for the first time, with a chorus of about three dozen voices. Two years later the Society inaugurated the custom of presenting the oratorio at least twice a year at Christmas time.

Its eighty-sixth and eighty-seventh performances will be given in Carnegie Hall this season with a chorus of 294 voices, on Tuesday afternoon, December 29, and Wednesday evening, December 30. Florence Hinkle, soprano; Marie S. Langston, contralto; Reed Miller, tenor, and Frederic Martin, bass, are to be the soloists.

Louis Koemmenich will conduct, and the orchestra will be that of the Symphony Society.

These "Messiah" concerts are unique in metropolitan musical activities. They never fail to fill Carnegie Hall, not only with the usual devotees of choral music, but with clergymen, choirmasters, church singers, and a host of devout people, long well aware that in these careful presentations they are assured, not only of a beautiful and artistic, but of a deeply reverential treatment of this sublime and consolatory work.

Mozart Society's Brilliant Concert.

The New York Mozart Society, Mrs. Noble McConnell, president, gave its first private concert of the season under the leadership of its new director, Walter Henry Hall, on Wednesday evening, December 16, at the Hotel Astor. This concert was very largely attended and was a singular success. The assisting artists were Marie Rappold and Reinald Werrenrath. Alice Nielsen was scheduled to appear, but a note in the program announced that, owing to Miss Nielsen's illness, Mme. Rappold would be heard in her place.

MRS. NOBLE McCONNELL,
President, New York Mozart Society.

The ladies' chorus, numbering about 125 members, was heard in the following numbers: "Summer Evening," Lassen; "Home Sighs," Lassen; cantata, "The Highwayman," Deems Taylor; "A Dreaming Rose," Victor Harris; "Der Nussbaum," Schumann; "In May," Horatio Parker.

The noteworthy feature of the evening was the first performance in New York of Deems Taylor's new cantata for ladies' chorus and orchestra, "The Highwayman." This musical setting was made to a gruesome and tragic ballad by Alfred Noyes. The music for the most part is in extremely modern style and many passages are very beautiful, notably the passages referring to the highwayman's love. On the other hand, there are many passages which seem to indicate inexperience and possible carelessness, the composer permitting passages to enter into the composition which are certainly objectionable, and which, by a more careful revision, could easily be eradicated. On several words, notably the word "Highwayman" in the opening chorus, the accents are improperly placed, and in the passage, "He'd a French cocked hat on his forehead," etc., the music descends from its high classical plane to an all too popular theme for a work of its serious nature. In other places, as, for instance, in the baritone solo and chorus at the end of the first part, the orchestration is too loud, and in the final chorus with the baritone solo it is quite impossible for the listener to distinguish the various parts and to comprehend the meaning or intention of the composer. As a whole, however, excepting for these comparatively short passages, the work is fine and very effective. It shows real inspiration and a complete theoretical knowledge of the art of composition. Mr. Werrenrath's solos were beautifully done, especially the opening solo, "One Kiss, My Bonnie Sweetheart," the fine quality of his baritone lending itself unusually well to these tender and passionate melodies.

One of the most successful songs of the evening was the beautiful melody of Victor Harris, "A Dreaming Rose," exquisitely conceived and perfectly constructed for the chorus of women's voices.

The work of the chorus under Mr. Hall is remarkably fine, and some of the pianissimos, particularly in the last line of each verse of "Home Sighs," were exquisite in their sonorous lightness and purity, and their perfect tonal balance.

Mr. Werrenrath, in addition to singing the solos in the cantata, was heard in a group of songs and scored an enviable success.

Mme. Rappold sang Max Bruch's beautiful "Ave Maria" with orchestra, and two sets of songs with piano accompaniment. Her splendid art was the recipient of much appreciation and she was forced to give a number of encores. Her success was particularly marked in Puccini's "Vissi d'arte."

After the intermission, Mr. Hall was presented with a very handsome Tiffany baton of ivory and dull gold with the society seal and inscription, "From the president and choral members of the New York Mozart Society," as a token of the society's appreciation.

David Bispham in Washington.

David Bispham was given an ovation in Washington, D. C., December 11, when he sang at the Columbia Theatre. This critical city has often heard the great American baritone sing, during the years since his return to his native land after enough European triumphs to satisfy the heart of any artist for all time, but these audiences have never given evidence of greater enjoyment than upon the occasion of this visit. Mr. Bispham's voice was in the very best condition, and it was a matter of general comment among those who best understand the art of singing that there is nothing which he cannot do with it, from the agility required in the Handel fioriture passages to the breadth of the old Italian bel canto aria. Extraordinary in lucidity and in flexibility was his singing of the songs of German classic period, and what David Bispham has done and does constantly for the American composer is difficult to state adequately. He is making the history of the American composer and he is doing still more—he is keeping alive the spark of hope in the heart of many who would not otherwise have had the courage to make the desperate fight.

Following Mr. Bispham's appearance in Washington and Richmond, the baritone went to sing a return engagement at Galesburg, following that with appearances in Cleveland, Burlington, Vt., Springfield, Mass., and later he will sing in Boston before going South for a month or six weeks on a tour now being arranged by Frederic Shipman, who has again taken exclusive direction of the tours of the baritone.

A Huss Informal Hour of Music.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Holden Huss received a large number of friends for an informal hour of music at Carnegie Hall, New York, on Monday afternoon, December 14. An interesting program was rendered by Mr. and Mrs. Huss and by Winthrop Parkhurst and Eleonore Payez, two of Mr. Huss' advanced pupils.

Mrs. Huss was heard in Wagner's "Träume," Schumann's "Die Soldatenbraut," Fauré's "Après une Rêve," Massenet's "Serenade du Passant" and Huss' beautiful "After Sorrow's Night." The beautiful natural quality of Mrs. Huss' voice and the excellence of her art render her interpretations always attractive. She was particularly successful with her opening number, Wagner's "Träume," the character of which is especially [illegible] her deeply poetic and musical temperament.

Mr. Huss played two of his own compositions, the "Etude Romantique," op. 23, dedicated to and frequently used by Paderewski, and a new "Valse Arabesque," which Mr. Huss has just completed and of which the dedication has been accepted by Harold Bauer. The writer was unfortunately unable to remain to hear this new "Valse Arabesque," but a review of it will be given at an early date.

Winthrop Parker is a very talented young pupil of Mr. Huss, and shows his teacher's careful and scholarly training. He played two numbers by Chopin and the "Poem to the Night" and the "Valse" in A major by Mr. Huss. The "Poem to the Night" was especially well played and won much approval with the audience on account of the beauty of its melody and its ethereal charm.

Eleonore Payez, whose work has already been more than once mentioned in these columns, played Brahms' rhapsody in B minor, op. 79, and Hungarian dance in B minor, and the nocturne in D major by Huss. She again proved herself to be the possessor of a remarkably well developed technic and unusual force, and her strong musical and poetic instinct was shown in the beautiful and melodic nocturne by Mr. Huss.

This informal hour of music was largely attended and was a genuine artistic and popular success.

Pittsburgh Contralto Chosen.

Mabel King, a young and talented singer of Pittsburgh, Pa., has been chosen to fill the contralto position in the choir of the Point Breeze Presbyterian Church of that city. Miss King, who is a pupil of William Wilson Campbell, head of the musical department at Westminster College, and a graduate of that college, was chosen from among a large number of applicants. She has a lovely voice and a pleasing personality, and will undoubtedly win for herself many friends in this new field of endeavor.

Leefson Pupil's Recital.

At Elkins Park, Pa., on December 3, Virginia Brown, pianist, gave a recital, assisted by Edward Shippen van Leer and Katherine Wales, vocalists. She gave a varied and interesting program, displaying a brilliant technic and decidedly musical instinct. She was perhaps at her best in the Chopin numbers, of which she gave an intelligent interpretation. Her playing throughout the evening reflected great credit upon her teacher, Maurits Leefson, the Philadelphia pedagogue.

In one respect, France has been tardy. The author of "It's a Long, Long Way to Tipperary" has yet to be made an Academician.—Puck.

A Valued Letter.

134 West Eighty-second Street,
New York, December 18, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

Again it is my privilcge to address a few lines to you personally, and if you consider them worth printing, then may they find space in your splendid paper which represents so entirely the real and sincere in all that it is accomplishing for music and musicians throughout the world.

It is my respect for the recent editorial on the means and use of advertising that calls forth this expression of my ideas as it did once before on the same subject.

The question is "How are we to become known if we do not advertise, and why should we advertise if we have nothing of value to give an expectant public?"

And why the "expectant public?" I reply, "The public is expecting more and more from its teachers in all branches of professional service every day." To be personal; some members of the vocal profession have criticized my use of a valuable quotation for my "American School of Bel Canto," that in it I have made a sweeping assertion to head my school with the title "A School of Singing which sets the Standard in Vocal Art," and who have further assailed the dignity of my school in my residence as merely a studio. Either fulfills its mission, of which all teachers may be justly proud.

Will you permit me right here to make my own assertion that I am striving for just such a standard of excellence, that the vocal students of this country may attend a school that will prove in every lesson given that it is a "School of Singing which actually does set the Standard in Vocal Art?"

I intend by the standard I have set for my school of singing to have it universally recognized as the first school of singing in this country for successful, absolutely flawless voice placing, style, diction and repertoire. I never criticize or trouble myself concerning what other teachers do or teach or their various methods and vagaries. I only know that I teach an unfailing vocal method and I intend the world shall know of it and all about it. This brings me again to the advertising.

What right has any musician to believe he can make a lasting reputation without the advertising? What good is the advertising without the "writeups?" What good are the "writeups" without splendid examples in pupils to prove them? And what paper will give a "writeup" that is not deserved and merited upon the achievements of the advertiser? Would not both advertiser and paper go down together if, upon investigation, the advertiser were being meretriciously advertised for mercenary reasons? If orchestral societies with their great conductors do not advertise, how can the public from New York to San Francisco know of their artistic and often astonishing programs? The same holds good of any vocal club, male and female from one end of our country to the other, together with the great festival choruses in many cities and their distinguished conductors.

Every one who loves music, in and out of the profession, is interested in the programs and is ever desirous of knowing the names of the presiding officers. We want to know all about the musical enterprises of every city and town in the country. How are we to receive this information? Either by first hand or through a musical journal. This brings me again to the subject of advertising by the teacher, school or soloist.

An advertisement appearing in a distinguished weekly journal or in the great dailies merely states what the school, studio, artist, club, orchestra or drygoods house has to offer. It is what is said or written concerning that school, studio, artist, club or orchestra, or what is found in the drygoods store that counts. Press notices count as much for the teacher as they count for the soloist. If the soloist is famous, he takes a page and the editor sees to it that the world is made acquainted with the facts of his success and the reasons for it. If a teacher believes he has a great vocal method, let him straightway go forth and advertise it and have it written about and acclaimed upon its merits and by the pupils who can prove it; pupils both private as well as professional, preferably the private ones as they are the final test, the last word in the work of a school or studio.

Let the teacher take pages and pay for them at every heroic sacrifice, if need be, but let the world know through the editors that such an one is making no exploitation of a God-given gift, but a merited publicity that will reach the serious pupil who, in wanting to become a great artist, will know where to go for the best vocal work; the best beginning, the best place to start the beginner and the finished pupil, and to restart the ambitious but often deeply injured (vocally) young singer and even professionals, on an upward path toward the goal of their ambitions. This last I want to emphasize.

Furthermore, for years I have followed the rise of singers, instrumentalists, and teachers in your distinguished paper and I have never yet seen you withhold your recognition of true merit.

I believe in teachers, school, and artists advertising largely and continuously. Where all cannot begin largely, all should begin where they can, and as they begin to show what they can do, the small space will give place to larger space, and as they achieve, so will their achievements be chronicled until full pages are necessary as mediums to tell their stories of success to the world. Little by little their names would become familiar to the reading public, and also that their names stand for good work, high achievements and sincerity. But all the advertising in the whole world could never bring lasting success while there remained one thing instrumentally or vocally that a teacher or soloist thus advertised could not give in perfection to the public or his pupils or live up to high ideals as advertised of his institution.

Thanking you many times for any line in commendation of my work, for the advertising space I have so gladly contracted for and which has spread abroad the knowledge of this "American School of Bel Canto," and for the long continued friendship which I hope will extend far, far into the years and years to come, I am, as always,

Faithfully yours,

HELENE MAIGILLE.

A New Orchestra.

Julian Carrillo, late director of the National Conservatory in Mexico City, is responsible for the organization of the America Symphony Orchestra, which had a private dress rehearsal at Aeolian Hall, New York, December 16. A printed statement says that this orchestra was "recently organized on the cooperative plan, with the ideal of giving an impulse to the production of high class American music." At the dress rehearsal a symphony in D major by Carrillo was performed, of which the writer heard two movements, allegro and andante sostenuto. The work is fairly well constructed, but shows no originality, and it is difficult to conceive of any reason why it should have been composed. It is not in modern style and might have emanated from the pen of any composer of the time of Mendelssohn. The ideas on which it is based are of little value and the melodic passages possess few claims to beauty.

A statement on the written prospectus brings us to the old and familiar question: "What is American music?" As generally spoken of by the composers of the United States, it means United States music and certainly does not include the music of Mexico or of South America. We United States (as we dare not call ourselves Americans, it seems) look upon these peoples as too directly descended from their Spanish forefathers to possess any American nationalism, although they do live on this continent. Of course, strictly speaking, they are as American as we are ourselves, but societies for the propagation of American music which have been formed in these United States certainly never contemplated including the music of Mexican or South American composers.

It is understood that the America Symphony Orchestra proposes to go on tour.

Clarence Eddy Busy in Recitals.

Clarence Eddy is busy with organ recitals throughout the West and Middle West, and is everywhere winning his customary success. On December 1 he played at the First M. E. Church, Red Oak, Ia., giving a varied programe of compositions both ancient and modern. On December 4 he appeared at the First M. E. Church at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., playing a program of the same varied nature, which shows his versatility and renders his recitals always both interesting and instructive. Among other things, he played at both of these recitals two compositions by Gordon Balch Nevin, "The Song of Sorrow" and "Will o' the Wisp." The latter is reported as being unusually attractive and successful.

Craft-Beach Encomiums.

On December 4, Marcella Craft, the American soprano, and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, the American composer, gave a joint recital in Kansas City at the Shubert Theatre under the management of Myrtle Irene Mitchell. The concert was a brilliant success, and Frank A. Marshall, the critic of the Journal of December 5, wrote of the musicale:

Myrtle Irene Mitchell offered the patrons of her concert series a thoroughly delightful entertainment at the Shubert yesterday afternoon. It was somewhat of a departure from the average run of even first class concerts, presenting as it did three artists in widely different departments of musical art—singer, pianist and harpist—the pianist's art being subdivided into composer and accompanist of the singer singing and the composer's own songs. Superficially that collection of artistic gifts smacks of concessions to a demand for variety, but in the persons of Marcella Craft, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and Angelo Cortese the very pleasing variety of the entertainment was raised to the highest plane of artistry.

Miss Craft logically comes first, since she was programmed as the literal "prima donna" of the afternoon and was supposed to be merely "assisted" by the other two. The "assistance" of Mrs. Beach and Signor Cortese, however, was so effective that their offerings vied with those of Miss Craft in the favor of the audience, without the slightest reflection upon the "first lady" of the occasion. Miss Craft is an American singer who has for years held a high place in German operatic circles. She has a beautiful soprano of marvelous richness and power, under the most perfect rein, and together with it she has a delightfully unaffected and spontaneous personality, which makes her audience instinctively a gathering of friends within a very short time. . . .

Her limpid voice made the limpid Italian a superlative treat, reinforced by an enunciation that was flawless. . . .

A typical group of German lieder provided the conventional concert opportunity and a group of ariettas from "Madame Butterfly" gave her the chance to display her operatic quality.

It would be idle, however, to say that, so far as the audience as a whole was concerned, the most enjoyable vocal feature of the afternoon was the little group of Mrs. Beach's songs sung to the accompaniment of the composer herself. "Exaltation" and "A Song of Love" aroused the enthusiasm of the audience to demand an encore, and it was given the rare treat of hearing "The Year's at the Spring" to the composer's own accompaniment. The dainty little vocal "humoresque," "Wouldn't That Be Queer?" brought the group to a close. . . .

Mrs. Beach contributed her very effective "Suite Francaise," which stamped her as a pianist only equaled by her gifts as a composer. Her other offering was a first time reading of a valse fantasie of her own composition. . . .

The Kansas City Star of December 6, published the following letter from a "Concert Goer," who wished to express his appreciation for the concert given by Marcella Craft at the Shubert Theatre there on December 5:

To the Star: I desire to express the unusual pleasure I had in attending the concert given last Friday by Marcella Craft and Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The combination of singer and composer was unique. Remembering Mrs. Beach's symphony, not to mention the songs that had preceded her, there was no surprise in the general excellence of her contributions to the program, both as composer and interpreter. But I wonder how many were prepared for the vocal resources and dramatic power of Miss Craft, and for the fine spiritual exaltation that pervaded some of her numbers, especially one of the Italian group.

Of course, the success that Miss Craft has had in Germany and Italy had established her place in opera. But I know of no operatic singer with whom to compare her. She is strongly individual. . . . But in all that she does this responsive temperament comes to her aid, giving color to every phrase. Indeed, this is the distinctive characteristic of Miss Craft's singing. However tastes may differ as to the singing of any of the numbers of her program—several of which often are sung solely for their pure lyric beauty—her method begets the feeling that she herself gives to all her work.

Few concert singers would dare to go to the lengths of dramatic interpretation that Miss Craft goes in the "Madame Butterfly" numbers; it would be too hazardous. But how well she does it! . . .

Miss Craft has an unusually resourceful voice. It seems to have expanded largely through the feeling she indulges. What I liked especially, taking Miss Craft's singing all in all, was its fine spirit. For one, I felt that I was in the presence of a most unusual interpreter.—Concert Goer.

Ovations Tendered Julia Claussen.

Some San Francisco, Ogden and Salt Lake City notices regarding Mme. Claussen's appearances there follow:

The colors of the royal flag of Sweden adorned the big bouquets they gave last night to a singer with a regal voice. Julia Claussen received the tribute in exchange for song at Scottish Rite Auditorium, and I am much mistaken if her concert of next Sunday afternoon at the Cort Theatre does not resemble a mass meeting. . . .

We knew Mme. Claussen as a Wagnerian artist, and we also had heard her in "Herodiade," but since she was new to us in concert we must needs wait for such time as the few who go to everything reported favorably on her gifts as a recitalist. Even the memories of Claussen's Kundry seemed insufficient to attract the throng her gifts invited. But Sunday afternoon there will be a different tale to tell, or else those who waxed enthusiastic last night will have been stricken dumb. . . .

Mme. Claussen's voice seemed the largest contralto that has ever reverberated in Scottish Rite Auditorium. It is tremendous. Its depth is like the abysmal caves of her native land, and musical to its farthest reaches. Its heights are towering and as free as the wind swept peaks of her homeland mountains. There is a ruggedness in her exuberant vocalism matching her Amazonian proportions and completing an impression of heroic womanhood. . . . Her capacity to express emotion is limited only by the authenticity of feeling. Where real song can go, she finds her way unimpeded. . . .

But in Brahms' "Sappische Ode," brooding, long phrased, elegant yet passionate; in Strauss' protesting, tragic "Ruhe, Meine Seele"; in Hildach's apotheosis of spring gladness; her countryman, Sjogren's fantastic dark hued "Cloud"; MacFayden's theatrical "Inter Nos." or even Rotoli's somewhat obvious "My Bride Shall Be My Flag," this singer pours from a great heart the glories of real and mighty song.

ON ARRIVAL AT EVERETT, WASH., OCTOBER 27, 1914.

Neither is Mme. Claussen lacking in capacity for tenderness in song; she is all too feminine for that. It found exquisite moments in Wagner's "Dreams" or in the Meyerbeer aria of the mother lamenting her son's baseness.

In short, Mme. Claussen's range of expressiveness is coequal with the demands of great art. . . .—San Francisco Chronicle, November 5, 1914.

Julia Claussen, wonderful in vocal attainments, stately in figure and charming personality, inaugurated a series of high class musical recitals for the 1914-15 season at the Ogden Tabernacle last night. The recital was attended by one of the largest and most cultured audiences that ever gathered in the Tabernacle. Mme. Claussen last night proved herself to be the equal of any artist now before the public. From the limit of low register to the expression of highest tones the velvet quality of her voice never changed. Her breath control was a revelation to the students of vocal music, as it made possible the portrayal of every type of interpretative emotion, from the finest pianissimo to a display of brilliant dramatic power, without a break in the quality of tone. Mme. Claussen has all the prerequisites of a great singer and the personality that makes the popular one.

Mme. Claussen opened her program with the aria from "Samson and Delila," and instantly caught the interest of her hearers with the dignity and finish of her rendition.

Her second numbers were "Sappische Ode," by Brahms; "Traum durch die Dämmerung," Strauss; "Ruhe, Meine Seele," Strauss, and "Lenz," by Hildach. In the first two she displayed the finish of the real concert artist, her great power being subdued, and instead tones of exquisite sweetness coming from her lips. The third gave opportunity for the display of dramatic power and the fourth was a lively number that delighted every one. At the close of the group she was accorded an ovation of applause, that would not be stilled until she responded with an encore. . . .

The aria from "Le Prophete" ("Ah, mon fils") preceded her second group, and in the hig number Mme. Claussen revealed her power as a grand opera contralto, bringing into display her wide register, suppressed emotion and dramatic fire in a thrilling manner. . . .

Her next group of songs were "Molnet" ("The Cloud"); "Jahrlan Mocht Ich so, Dich Halten," by Sjogren, and "Efteraarstormen" ("The Autumn Storm"), by Grieg. These were sung in Swedish, but so finished was the interpretation, though but few in the audience understood the words, continued applause at the close of the Grieg number was evidence that their meaning was clear. . . .—Ogden (Utah) Standard, November 13, 1914.

Not since Assembly Hall was remodeled has it held so brilliant an audience as that which assembled last night to greet the noted singer, Julia Claussen. The concert was one of the most satisfying given here in many seasons. Mme. Claussen at once stepped into favor by her winning personality. . . . Her tones are rich, full and dramatic. . . . —Deseret Evening News, Salt Lake City, November 12, 1914.

Julia Claussen, gifted, graceful, artistic, temperamental, yet not to extremes, charmed . . . audience. . . . The noted Swedish contralto sang with understanding, a superb and well chosen program. Her voice is equal to the requirements set by every composer, and the beauty of her enunciation, whether she sang in English, French, German or her native Swedish, was perfect.—Salt Lake Tribune, November 12, 1914.

Seldom has Salt Lake City been given a treat equal to that last night. . . . The statuesque Swedish contralto was in fine voice and vigor. Her program was varied and gave an excellent idea of the scope of her remarkable repertoire. It would be hard to define just what field she appeared best in. . . . Claussen is at home in any of the musical atmospheres she chooses to enter. The best proof of the success locally of the singer may be had from the fact that Manager Graham has already been approached to arrange for a return engagement of the noted diva.—Salt Lake Evening Telegram, November 12, 1914.

Belle Gottschalk in Lodz.

Belle Gottschalk, the young lyric soprano, who has sung with success at Lodz, in Russian Poland, has two important engagements to fill the early part of January, one at Mount Holyoke College, January 8, the other with the Lehigh Valley Symphony Orchestra at Bethlehem, Pa., January 19.

Miss Gottschalk made her debut at Lodz as Marta in Kienzl's "Evangelimann," an opera little known in America, but very popular at the German opera houses. Kienzl's newer opera, "Kuhreigen," or more familiarly known here as "The Dance of Death," was not so popular as "The Pious Beggar," as Evangelimann is called in English.

BELLE GOTTSCHALK,
As Marta, in "Evangelimann," by Kienzl.

The recent prominence of Lodz in the Eastern theatre of war has made Miss Gottschalk's year in opera in that city doubly interesting to her. Unfortunately all of Miss Gottschalk's newspaper criticisms, to say nothing of her costumes and opera scores, are in her home in Berlin. The soprano was enjoying a restful vacation at Skodsborg, Denmark, when the war broke out and she was not able to return to her apartment to secure any of her belongings.

Violin Recital by Louis Siegel.

An interesting violin recital was given on Tuesday evening, December 15, at Aeolian Hall, New York, by Louis Siegel. His program consisted of the sonata in E minor by Bach; "Renaissance," Godowsky (transcribed for the violin by Mr. Siegel); a set of five pieces by Rameau; a set of four pieces by Chopin, Strauss and Brahms, and Wieniawski's polonaise in A major.

Mr. Siegel showed himself to be a player of talent and ability. He possesses a fluent technic and a good tone; his double stopping is excellent and his intonation generally faultless. His interpretation of the Bach sonata was broad and classical, and in this, as in the other numbers on the program, he played with strict adherence to classical traditions. Mr. Siegel's musical and poetic temperament were best shown in the Chopin "Nocturne" and in the Strauss "Traumerei," and he exhibited a brilliant technic in the Wieniawski polonaise.

The accompaniments were played by John Warner.

Mme. Gabrilowitsch's Recital.

At the Little Theatre, New York, Friday afternoon, December 15, a large and very well pleased audience listened to a most interesting recital by Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch, the contralto.

German, Russian and American composers were Mme. Gabrilowitsch's choice, being represented by Schubert's "Die Allmacht," "Halt by the Brook," "Am Grabe Anselmo's"; Schumann's "Der Sandmann," "In's Frei"; Brahms' "Minnelied," "Wehe so willst Du mich wieder," "Immer leiser wird mein Schummer," "Der Gang zum Liebchen" and "Dort in den Weiden"; Tschaikowsky's "Die Thrane Bebt;" Rimsky-Korsakow's "Song of the Shepherd Lehl;" Rachmaninoff's "Der Fliederbusch;" two by Mme. Gabrilowitsch's distinguished husband, the pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, her accompanist also, "Die Wasserfahrt" and Nähe des Geliebten;" "Love is a Sickness" and "Once I Loved a Maiden Fair," Horatio Parker, and Mrs. Beach's "The Year's at the Spring."

Depth of musical feeling, power of projecting emotion, an impressive mental grasp, rare gifts of interpretation, coupled with a voice of much warmth and good range made the singer's renderings enjoyable beyond the ordinary so far as connoisseurs of the higher singing art were concerned.

"Die Allmacht" disclosed the volume of Mme. Gabrilowitsch's voice, "Der Sandmann" revealed resource in insinuating nuances, so much so, in fact, that the number had to be repeated. "Wehe so willst Du mich wieder," "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" and "Der Gang zum Liebchen," particularly the last-named, were splendid examples of breathing and phrasing "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" was repeated.

"Song of the Shepherd Lehl" and the Gabrilowitsch numbers of the Russian group evoked encore demanding applause. The songs by the concert giver's husband are melodious, striking in characterization, and musical in facture and harmonic treatment.

An unaffected, naturally charming stage presence adds significantly to Mme. Gabrilowitsch's delivery of her songs, and made the entire afternoon one of unalloyed delight.

It seems superfluous to add that Mr. Gabrilowitsch's piano accompaniment, were no small factor in the success of the program. They were all that would be expected from a musician of his fame.

The Dilemma of Wares.

On her Texas tour, Helen Ware, the interpreter of Hungarian and Slav music, was complimented on being a member of the talented Ware family who have given America great architects, composers, actressess, illustrators, and a representative in the violin world. Miss Ware graciously accepted the compliment and replying to the hearty toast offered with it, amused the company around the banquet table with the following experience:

"The other evening at the close of my concert in Houston, Texas, an admiring lady rushed up to me and ardently complimented me on my performance. Then she went on to say that David Bispham was also a great admirer of my work and that he had sung a number of my beautiful songs. Now, up to the present time my attempts at composition have been limited to the arrangements for the violin of Hugarian and Slavic folksongs, one of which I had played at this particular concert. So I blushed and told the enthusiastic lady she must be mistaken. I had never met David Bispham and I was quite sure he had never sung any of my songs. I suggested that perhaps he had referred to Harriet Ware the eminent song composer. 'No indeed,' declared the loyal lady, 'it was Helen Ware, we talked for hours about you.' I kept on arguing with her, but finally in order to win my point I had to confess and in front of all those people too that I had never composed a song in my life! But I have decided not to be caught that way again. I shall compose a song and if no one will sing it, I shall play it."

An Interesting Joint Recital.

A joint recital was given by Edna Harris, reader, and Elizabeth Harris, soprano, assisted by Annola Florence Wright, accompanist, at Montville, N. J., on December 4. The program consisted of three sets of songs given by Elizabeth Harris, alternating with readings by Edna Harris, and is reported to have been a genuine success. The accompaniments were brilliantly played by Miss Wright, the New York pianist and teacher, who is also organist and choir director of the Christian Union Congregational Church of Upper Montclair, N. J.

Alois Trnka at Tonkuenstler Verein.

Alois Trnka, the Bohemian violinist, delighted a good sized and enthusiastic audience at the Tonkünstler Verein concert on Tuesday evening, December 15, at Assembly Hall, New York. He played the following group of three compositions: Polonaise, op. 8, Ferd. Laub; andante cantabile, op. 24, No. 1, G. Sgambati; "Saltarello," op. 4, No. 4, Ferd. Laub, and with Marion Tiffany Marsh, Saint-Saëns' fantaisie for harp and violin, op. 124, which latter work brought forth liberal applause.

Mr. Trnka is so well known as an artist of high attainments that it is unnecessary to go into details regarding his fine talents. However, on this occasion, he displayed an unusually broad and sympathetic tone, absolutely true intonation and facile technic. His efforts were rewarded with much well deserved applause.

Marion Tiffany Marsh played "Menuet d'Amour," Massenet, and fantaisie, op. 95, Saint-Saëns, in her usual skillful manner, winning much favor. Adele Krueger sang a group of six songs with her customary charm. August Arnold, pianist, contributed Bach's chromatic fantasy and fugue. Encores were demanded and given by all the participants.

The accompanists were Walter Kiesewetter for Mme. Krueger, and Ludmila Vojacek-Wetche for Mr. Trnka.

Philharmonic Plans.

The next concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York will be the first of the two annual concerts for young people, with Kitty Cheatham in descriptive songs and recitations, details of which will be announced later. Meanwhile the orchestra will be kept busy at rehearsals the concerts which were to have been given in Canada during the coming week having been cancelled on account of the war.

Grace Kerns Engaged for Symphony Tour.

Grace Kerns, soprano soloist of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, said to be one of the highest paid choir positions in America, has been engaged as soloist for the spring tour of the New York Symphony Orchestra during the months of April and May, 1915.

Des Moines and Erie Acclaim Anna Case.

Art and beauty held sway last evening . . . when Anna Case appeared in concert before an audience which responded with warmth and enthusiasm to the magnetism and charm of her personality. It was a brilliant evening. . . . Miss Case has conquered the technic of her art, but with true art she makes one forget there is technic. To sing seems to her naturally easy, a very simple thing to do—thus does she prove herself an artist. Her voice is at all times clear, sweet and smooth. It has rich, warm tones. Even in her highest notes there seemed more than the usual color and sweetness. "Thy Hidden Gems Are Rich Beyond All Measure" (a song of India) was a beautiful tone picture. The artist was obliged to repeat this little gem. Into the "Ave Maria" Miss Case sang a wonderful depth of feeling. It is this appealing quality in her voice which draws her hearers to her.—The Register and Leader, Des Moines, Ia., October 27, 1914.

Anna Case, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, whose coming had been heralded with such praise as to make it difficult to live up to it, achieved the well-nigh impossible feat of making good, and made the audience hers with the singing of her first number.

The people were delighted with Miss Case and with her singing. Such enthusiasm is not often manifested by Erie audiences. The applause that followed her every appearance was as spontaneous as it was enthusiastic. In the songs, divided between German and English, she sang with a voice so sweet and thrilling and with a charm so vivacious and so very taking that her audience felt they had found a delightful young playfellow who gave her whole heart to entertaining them, and whom they scarce liked to see vanish behind the scenes.

The two great numbers given by Miss Case, the arias from "La Traviata," and from "Sonnambula" displayed the dramatic possibilities of the young artist as to voice and interpretation to great advantage, and she made a profound impression. The last vibration of the high note that closed the intense "Traviata" aria had not ceased when chorus and audience went wild with applause.—Erie, Pa., Times, October 30, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Benefit Concert at Hotel Ritz-Carlton.

A brilliant and fashionable audience attended the concert for the benefit of the field service of the French Red Cross on Thursday evening, December 17, in the ballroom of the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, New York, at which music written in the main by French composers was performed.

The artists who participated were: Loraine Wyman, soprano; Emilio de Gogorza, baritone, and the Flonzaley Quartet. Victor Harris, under whose direction this concert was given, proved himself a masterly organizer and deserves much praise.

The Flonzaley players charmed by their artistic rendition of Léclair's sonata for two violins and cello, as well as two movements (andante cantabile and allegro risoluto) of Tschaikowsky's quartet in D major, op. 11, both of which were performed with perfect ensemble, beautiful tone coloring and superb interpretation.

Miss Wyman gave two groups of French songs. Mr. de Gogorza sang a group of old French songs in his inimitable manner, and later sang five songs by modern composers. He was in excellent voice and received much well deserved applause. The accompanists were Mrs. Louis H. Smith for Miss Wyman, and Carl Lamson for Mr. de Gogorza.

New York Harpist's Record.

Annie Louise David, the harpist, has established a record for the number of appearances she has made in one city outside of New York. On Wednesday evening, December 16, she made her twenty-fifth appearance in Newark, N. J., and on the following morning she gave a recital at Miss Post's Private School, in the same city, making her twenty-sixth date in Newark.

On her programs this year she is including a new composition written for her by Margaret Hoberg, which has been very well received.

Christmas Sunday she plays with J. Warren Andrews at the Church of the Divine Paternity in the morning, at the West End Collegiate in the afternoon, and with John Hyatt Brewer in Brooklyn in the evening.

Mme. ERNESTINE SCHUMANN-HEINK

The consensus of opinion of the entire New York daily press, as shown in the reviews of her appearance in New York on Sunday, December 13, proclaims her the leading contralto before the American public.

(New York World, December 14, 1914.)

Mme. Schumann-Heink's drawing powers were shown again at yesterday afternoon's concert of the New York Symphony, in Aeolian Hall, when she was the soloist. A large and enthusiastic audience applauded at every opportunity. Her numbers comprised "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles"; Erda's scene from "Rheingold," and the Waltraute scene from "Götterdämmerung." These last two numbers the soloist sang with great feeling, fine expression and exquisite finish.

(New York Tribune, December 14, 1914.)

. . . The appearance of Ernestine Schumann-Heink is always an event of popular appeal. Needless to say, then, Aeolian Hall held as large an audience as could crowd into it, an audience which listened with pleasure and applauded with enthusiasm the German contralto's singing of "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles"; Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," and Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung."

It is needless to discuss Mme. Schumann-Heink's art at this late juncture. It was yesterday what it always has been.

(New York Times, December 14, 1914.)

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra at Aeolian Hall. The orchestral program comprised Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, two movements of a serenade for strings in D by Robert Fuchs, and Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz. Mme. Schumann-Heink's numbers were "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles"; Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," and Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung." There was a large audience.

The concert was a well arranged one and gave much pleasure. The soloist was in good voice. In her Wagner numbers she gave an exposition of the best manner of accomplishing the not always grateful task of presenting excerpts from this composer's music drama on the concert stage. The numbers she used were well adapted to the purpose by their character, and, with Mr. Damrosch's well contrived accompaniments sustaining the singer's efforts, the music was clothed with a significance and atmosphere that was most impressive. Not the least of the features to excite admiration was the success with which Mme. Schumann-Heink adapted her voice to fit the auditorium.

(New York Sun, December 14, 1914.)

The Symphony Society's concert in Aeolian Hall in the afternoon provided pleasures for those who are not searching after the more recondite things in music. Wagner and Mendelssohn furnished the chief numbers, and Mme. Schumann-Heink, the soloist, sang first "Andromache's Lament," from Max Bruch's "Achilles," and later two Wagner excerpts, Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold" and the Waltraute scene from "Götterdämmerung."

The first selection gave the singer opportunity for a display of opulence of voice and much dramatic fervor, while in the Wagner music she relied more on the expression of feeling. Each appearance of the distinguished singer evoked prolonged applause.

(New York Herald, December 14, 1914.)

Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist of the concert. Her contributions were "Andromache's Lament," from "Achilles," by Bruch; Erda's scene from "Das Rheingold," and Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung." In all she gave much pleasure, both from beauty of tone—in this respect she appeared to be better than at her recent recital—and from the breadth of style in interpreting her music. The two long Wagnerian arias brought to the minds of many the days when Mme. Schumann-Heink sang in those operas in the Metropolitan Opera House.

(New York Evening Post, December 14, 1914.)

At Aeolian Hall the New York Symphony Orchestra had the incomparable Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist yesterday afternoon. She first lent her glorious voice to the interpretation of "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles," and then recalled the good old times at the Metropolitan by singing, as only she can sing, the Erda scene from "Rhinegold" and the Waltraute episode from "Götterdämmerung." There was much enthusiasm over her art.

(New York Press, December 14, 1914.)

Added to the interesting diversity of the program which was presented by Dr. Damrosch yesterday at the seventh Sunday afternoon concert of the New York Symphony in Aeolian Hall was the singing of Mme. Schumann-Heink as soloist.

That this famous contralto finds as ready a response as she could wish for was demonstrated by the enthusiasm of the audience which packed the hall. . . . Mme. Schumann-Heink's singing of "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilles," with its heights and depths of grief sounding in the clean, clear, high notes and the astonishing low notes, was dramatic and powerful. And the Erda scene from "Rheingold" and the Waltraute scene from "Götterdämmerung" also were given with finished art and conviction.

(Brooklyn Daily Eagle, December 14, 1914.)

Schumann-Heink was the bright resplendent star of the third of the New York Symphony concerts at the Academy Saturday afternoon. She was down for "My Heart, at Thy Sweet Voice," from "Samson and Delilah," and for a group of German and English songs. She had hardly walked upon the stage when her hearty greeting of the audience, the musicians and the conductor established her familiar dominion over a public which loves her. The Saint-Saëns aria was sung with depth and tenderness rather than with plenitude of tone, but it was all so genuine, the feeling was so true, that one would not have had it different if he could. Later, she gave three German and two English songs with a beauty which irradiated them and a sincerity which went straight to the heart of her audience. Two of them were by Carl Loewe, among his simpler and more tender ballads, "Das Erkennen," in which the singer caught the glorification of mother love to perfection, and "Mutter an der Wiege," in which the archness and the family love made a delightful contrast. Both in this and in the quaint old German folk song which followed, "Spinner Liedchen," the singer brought out the root resemblance of so many of the words to English speech that her German sounded intelligible to listeners who lacked even a smattering of that complex tongue and made the effect of her songs almost as great as though she had been singing in English. Her two English songs offered a like contrast to those which she sang in German, one being the tender and poetic "Down in the Forest," by L. Ronald, and the other the "cute" little "Child's Prayer," by J. Harold. The singer's English enunciation was delightfully perfect and her diction admirable. Indeed, she lavished a wealth of art on these simple things which some singers would have reserved for a great aria. But she had her reward in the applause that simply would not be quieted until she had added a little German song to the printed program. As usual, her accompaniments were sympathetically played by Katherine Hoffmann.

(New York Evening World, December 14, 1914.)

Schumann-Heink was the soloist with the Symphony Society at Aeolian Hall yesterday afternoon. She sang "Andromache's Lament," from Bruch's "Achilleus"; Erda's scene from "Rheingold," and Waltraute's scene from "Götterdämmerung." She was in fine voice and was recalled many times by a crowded house.

(New York Evening Mail, December 14, 1914.)

The melodious and the dramatic in music shared yesterday's program of the New York Symphony Society. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, supported by a delightful serenade for strings, by the Viennese pedagogue Fuchs, supplied the former element in abundance. Dramatically contrasting were three vocal numbers by Mme. Schumann-Heink and the "Mephisto" waltz of Liszt.

The great contralto has lost none of her power to stir an audience with the cello like quality of her tones. In the "Lament of Andromache," from Max Bruch's "Achilleus," she sang with a commanding sonority which reached a climax in the words "Ilium! Ilium!"

(New York Staats-Zeitung, December 14, 1914.)

At yesterday's afternoon concert with the Damrosch Orchestra, Ernestine Schumann-Heink was the soloist. A capacity house prepared a reception for the artist which amounted to an ovation, and after her numbers the storm of applause was renewed, which proved to her in what high esteem the New York public holds her unique art. The artist sang first the "Lament of Andromache," from Bruch's "Achilles," in a style and with a magnificent portamento such as one nowadays scarcely hears, and there was something almost sacred in the Erda scene from "Rheingold" and the Waltraube scene from "Der Götterdämmerung."

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co,
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

Merry Christmas!

Of all the orchestral novelties heard in New York this winter, the "Sinfonietta" by seventeen year old Erich Korngold is far and away the best.

One of the best known Liszt pupils, Arthur Friedheim, has been playing between films at the Strand Theatre on Broadway, a moving picture house.

London Musical News very properly protests against the use of the final "e" in such words as "artiste," "pianiste," "violiniste," etc. The MUSICAL COURIER long ago was the first musical journal to drop the absurd custom.

Melbourne, Australia, enjoyed a startling musical novelty recently in the spectacle of Mme. Melba as an orchestral conductor. The occasion was a Red Cross concert. The Melbourne Musical News says: "As conductor she proved herself as efficient as in all other directions."

From Buffalo comes the news that John Lund, the conductor, who formerly resided there, has gone back to his first love and will give up his career as a traveling leader of comic opera in order to resume the baton directorship of the Buffalo Orpheus Society and the city's municipal orchestra. The MUSICAL COURIER congratulates Buffalo upon the prospect of its musical reawakening; the place needed it, as this paper pointed out some months ago.

Alexander Bloch, the violinist, whose successes in recital have been noted in the MUSICAL COURIER, writes that he has received a letter from Prof. Auer, saying that he arrived safely in Petrograd after a five days' journey, crossing Germany, Sweden and Finland. All his private pupils were permitted to leave Loschwitz (Dresden) except the father of Heifetz and an English pupil named Ludlow, who were held because they were within the age limit.

A German officer, who is a prisoner with the British, says the British Bandsman, made himself obnoxious to several staff officers by asking ridiculous and often impertinent questions. At last, however, he caught a tartar. Turning to an old infantry officer, he said: "How is it colonel, that your bugle call 'advance' is so very short, while the 'retreat' is just the reverse?" "Because, sir," said the veteran, "when a British soldier goes into action it only needs a little note from a bugle to make him advance anywhere, but it needs a whole brass band to make him retire."

Cleveland, Ohio, has been succeeding admirably this winter with its Municipal Symphony Orchestra, which as MUSICAL COURIER readers know is aided by that city. It assumes all the deficit resulting from the low prices of admission charged, twenty-five, fifteen and ten cents. Attendance at the Sunday concerts this season has averaged about 3,000, and a report received from a reliable source in Cleveland tells of "a remarkable growth in public interest and appreciation, owing chiefly to the fact that now the concerts under Christiaan Timmner possess real symphonic worth and value." Works produced at the recent concerts were by Mendelssohn, Saint-Saëns, Massenet, Berlioz, Grieg, Johann Strauss, Weber, Schubert ("Unfinished Symphony"), Bizet, Gounod, Volkmann, Lalo, Tschaikowsky, Beethoven, Lulli, Reinecke, Dvorák, etc. At the concert of December 27 there will be Beethoven's A major symphony, Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture, and a "Parsifal" excerpt, among other numbers. The auditors are supplied at these concerts with program notes by Wilson G. Smith, written in such a vein that they can be understood by others beside teachers of harmony and professors of mathematics.

Last Saturday's revival of "Euryanthe" at the Metropolitan serves to remind the New York Herald of an interesting and unfamiliar story: "Toscanini also conducted the work at La Scala, in Milan, years ago, and in the estimation of the Milanese operagoers the overture was so brilliantly done that he was applauded endlessly, the throng shouting to him to repeat the overture. Time and time again Mr. Toscanini tried to start the opera, but the applause was deafening. Finally in despair he threw down his baton and walked out of the orchestra pit. That was the cause of his leaving La Scala."

How thoroughly independent in its musical judgment is our great West, is illustrated by a passage from the Omaha Bee (December 11, 1914), written after a performance of "Lucia" in that city by the excellent San Carlo Opera Company: "The last time 'Lucia' was sung at the Auditorium, it was by the Metropolitan Opera Company. It is plucking no laurels from the wreaths of Caruso, Sembrich and the others, who sang that night, to say that the famous sextet was never better sung in Omaha than it was last night. One other fact impresses: On the former occasion almost as many people paid $5 a seat to get into the Auditorium to hear 'Lucia' as were present last night at $1 per seat. Which almost forces the conclusion that quite a multitude of the home folks have little difficulty in suppressing any ambition they may have to listen to grand opera, no matter what the price."

Plans for opera next season in the Boston Opera House are still in a state of uncertainty. However, the probability is that there will be a local company next season, and that this company will be recruited from the most unexpected of all sources. Boston is not desirous of being deprived of its opera, and strong influences are now at work toward a fulfillment of this wish. Henry Russell, manager of the Boston Opera Company, is in New York and expects to remain in this city until March. He told a representative of the MUSICAL COURIER recently that he was not yet ready to detail his plans for the future, but that he authorizes the statement that he is busy "on some big things, among them a contemplated season of opera in Boston next year." Mr. Russell expressed deep regret that his plans for another Paris season of opera should have been interfered with by the war. He had already received orders for many boxes for that season, and has letters from a number of people of great wealth and influence promising their support and patronage.

At a recent Philharmonic concert in Vienna, Felix Weingartner's brand new overture, "In Ernster Zeit," seems to belie the assertion that composers feel no desire to write music during war time. According to accounts, Weingartner used Tschaikowsky's "1812" as a model for "In Ernster Zeit." The French, English, Austrian and German national anthems are heard in contrapuntal conflict, with the Austro-German tunes triumphant, of course. The "Marseillaise" is introduced by Weingartner "in strident and mocking fashion," much as Strauss used the shrill voices in "Heldenleben" to characterize the music critics. The Russian hymn "is treated ironically, in new French whole tone manner, á la Debussy, par nobile fratrum." Finally, "at first softly and played by the cellos and basses, and then taken up as from afar by soft, full chords of the organ, one hears 'Gotterhalte,' which rises to a magnificent forte climax, and compels the hearers to rise from their seats and join in the concluding union of the German and Austrian hymns." At the Philharmonic concert the Viennese public received the novelty "with frantic enthusiasm, and the last part, the apotheosis, had to be repeated by Weingartner. Beethoven's fifth symphony ended the program majestically."

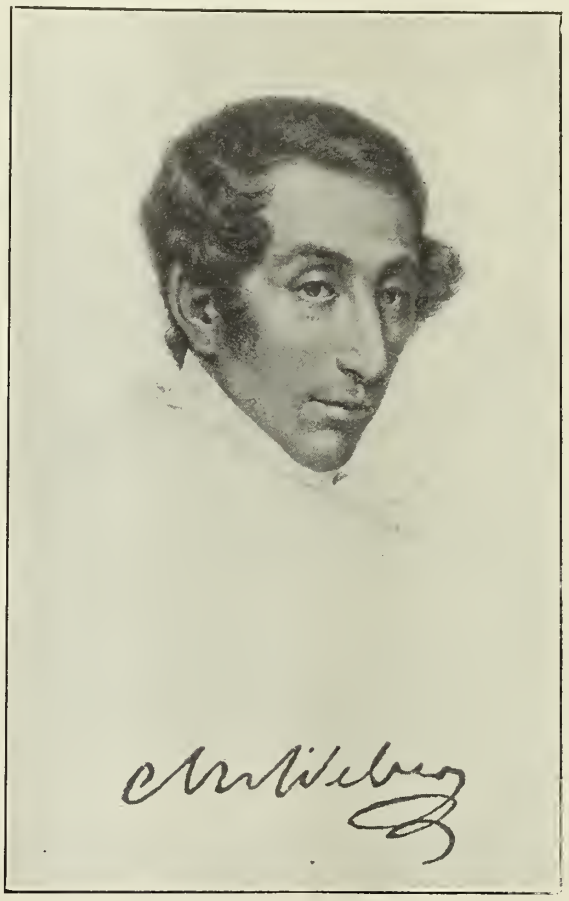
THE "EURYANTHE" REVIVAL.

Weber's sixth opera, and only grand opera, "Euryanthe," which was produced for the first time, October 25, 1823, at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, Vienna, and has been revived from time to time during the past century with but slight success, was once more resuscitated from its pale paper tomb and made a living work of art on the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on Saturday, December 19, 1914.

The book has been condemned from the beginning. Several attempts to remodel it have been made. Even as late as 1904 Gustav Mahler brought out a version of the work considerably altered by himself. But the libretto is not wholly to blame. A story that furnished Boccaccio with a novel and Shakespeare with a drama cannot be altogether without merit. Any one familiar with the "Decameron" (second day, ninth tale) and with "Cymbeline" must feel that cause of "Euryanthe's" failure lies deeper than the subject matter of the fundamental story which is to be found in the "Roman de la Violette" by Gilbert de Montreuil in the thirteenth century. Weber himself had a hand in fashioning the book for musical purposes. Helmine von Chezy willingly submitted her text to the critical revision of Weber, who was the greatest musical dramatic genius of Germany and who had spent all his early years with actors behind the scenes and his later years in the orchestral conductor's seat. If he did not know the opera house, no man ever knew it. He was satisfied with the libretto of "Euryanthe" and gave the best years of his life to the composing of the music. Yet the work was and is a failure. Why? Surely not because the vocal parts are so terribly exacting and difficult. Many of the voice passages are purely instrumental in character and uncomfortable to the singer. But Frieda Hempel as Euryanthe and Margarete Ober as Eglantine were not dismayed by any of the passages, high or low, rapid, broken, or sustained. If splendid singing and acting on the part of the two female characters in the piece could have redeemed the opera and carried it to a triumphant victory, the work of Frieda Hempel and Margarete Ober at the New York revival would have given "Euryanthe" its long deferred success. But success, in the accepted sense of the word, "Euryanthe" never can enjoy, in spite of many pages of ravishing beauty. From the beginning, in 1823, it was felt that the high strain of pathos was too long sustained.

The modern operatic public, however, could not feel much enthusiasm for "Euryanthe," even if the opera had once been as popular as "Der Freischütz." It must now suffer the fate of all works that have been surpassed by greater compositions of the same kind.

Lodge's "Rosalynde," for instance, was doomed when Shakespeare recreated and exalted it to "As You Like It." Marlowe's "Faustus," too, became little more than a literary and historical curiosity when Goethe's "Faust" appeared. Bach's contrapuntal works may never appeal to the great public. Nevertheless they have never been surpassed by any compositions of the same kind. Gluck's operas have an archaic grandeur of their own.



The grace and nobility of sentiment of Mozart's operas are in no wise affected by the romanticism of modern German dramatic opera. But Weber's "Euryanthe" is full of the acorns and saplings which subsequently grew into Wagnerian oaks. A hundred times one hears weak reminders of magnificent effects in "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan" and the "Ring." All glory and honor to Weber for first having led the German muse to the enchanted world of romance and mediaeval chivalry!

But, unfortunately for John the Baptist, he was overshadowed by the towering personality of the great master he preceded. His lone voice crying in the wilderness is heard with respect and sympathy by the disciples of the Master, though it no longer has authority.

It is hardly necessary at this late date to single out for special admiration any of the many beautiful arias and scenes in this now venerable opera. It has been studied by musicians for nearly a hundred years, and its overture is in the standard repertory of every great orchestra.

At the superb performance under the direction of Arturo Toscanini at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Saturday afternoon, Weber's picturesque and admirable orchestration was done full justice to. The difference between Weber and Wagner in the orchestra is due almost entirely to the chromatic brass instruments the latter master had at his disposal.

Weber had only the imperfect diatonic horns and trumpets, limited to the natural notes of the harmonic series. But the beauty of Weber's string accompaniments makes amends for the rich harmonies of Wagner's choir of brass. In the wood wind section of the orchestra Weber has never been surpassed. The wail of the long sustained and high notes of the bassoon and the plaintive tones of the solitary flute are enough in themselves to prove Weber's unerring dramatic instinct for the right music at the right time. Yet it cannot truthfully be said that "Euryanthe" is an opera one wishes to hear very often.

Hesiod remarked, some two thousand years ago, that sometimes the half is greater than the whole. In a like sense it may truly be said of "Euryanthe" that a very great deal of the music is much more agreeable than the sum total effect of the opera. But let no one lay sacrilegious hands upon it now to alter it and mutilate it into a popular success. It is what it is, and as it must remain. The world would not have thanked even a Phidias had he recut the stone deities of Egypt into another Venus and Apollo. "Euryanthe" is a landmark in the history of opera—the greatest work of the greatest operatic genius of Germany before the advent of Richard Wagner.

The part and music of Adolar the knight and the chivalrous lover of Euryanthe was intelligently acted and vigorously sung by the tenor Johannes Sembach. Arthur Middleton was a dignified and complacent king who placed his voice well and produced a most agreeable tone. Hermann Weil gave a dramatic and convincing account of the unscrupulous Lysiart. His singing of the music showed that he thoroughly understood the composer as well as the librettist. Max Bloch was Rudolph, and Mabel Garrison sang charmingly the important music allotted to the small part of Bertha.

Weber could have found no fault with the performance, unless the modern conception of his music is totally at variance with what he had in mind in the early years of the nineteenth century.

Certainly Helmine von Chezy never saw such a rich and gorgeous stage production of her work as that which Giulio Gatti-Casazza and his technical experts furnished for this revival.

Before dismissing "Euryanthe" with a shrug of the shoulders the captious critic will do well to remember that Weber was thirty-seven years of age when his greatest work was produced, and even then his health was shattered by the white plague that carried him off to an early grave three years later.

When "Lohengrin" was first produced in 1850, Wagner was also thirty-seven. But he had had a quarter of a century to study Weber. All Wagner's later works were composed at a more mature age that Weber never reached.

What would have been the operatic history of Germany if Weber and Wagner had changed places?

No one can tell.

SGAMBATI'S ACHIEVEMENT.

It appears upon investigation that last week's MUSICAL COURIER cable relating to Giovanni Sgambati's recent death in Rome was correct. The passing of this scholarly and successful Italian musician (born of an English mother, in 1843) is a serious blow to a country whose present tastes in music were fostered and expanded very largely by this Sgambati, disciple of Wagner, Liszt and the moderns generally. He foresaw the certain musical decadence of Italy if it continued to encourage only the limited operatic style of its stage composers then in vogue, and he raised his voice long and earnestly in exhortation to his musical countrymen to develop the symphonic forms and to follow the liberating lead of Wagner in the domain of opera. The works of the later Verdi and the freedom in style of some of the operas by the Neo-Italians went hand in hand with Sgambati's missionary labors in the cause of art, and he, Martucci, Bossi, Perosi, da Venezia, Sinigaglia, and Wolf-Ferrari showed that also in the domain of absolute music Italy was beginning to assert herself seriously and successfully.

The symphonic, solo, concerted, vocal and oratorio compositions put forth by the seven writers just mentioned, today occupy a recognized place in the modern repertoire of soloists, orchestras and singing societies of all nationalities. Aside from his ability as a composer, Sgambati also was a splendid conductor and an excellent composer. All classes of Italian musicians adored him, not only for his great work of having taught his compatriots the meaning of the best in music ancient and modern, but also because he always was vitally interested in the welfare of his colleagues, and encountered them with gentle ways, modesty of speech and demeanor, and deep and sympathetic insight based on real knowledge and high personal accomplishment. Now that Italy has lost Martucci and Sgambati, their places will be conspicuously difficult to fill.

It is hardly generally known to musicians that the reorganizer of the Paris Conservatoire on what is practically its present basis was no less a person than Napoleon Bonaparte. He found time to do the work in 1800.

A RAGOUT OF REVIEWS.

There is a fatal fascination for us in seeking information and instruction through reading the music criticisms in the New York daily newspapers. Last week we followed them with particular interest and assiduity, for there were many doubtful points in the current music making about which we desired to have our uncertain mind set at rest. The appended literal extracts are the result of our devoted search for truth and light:

MME. GABRILOWITSCH'S RECITAL, DECEMBER 15.

Tribune.

She displayed a voice of not a little natural beauty.

Times.

Her tones are usually better when delivered with power than in mezza voce or less.

Herald.

Her voice is not of marked beauty.

Staats Zeitung.

Unfortunately she is too partial to forcing her upper tones in forte, causing a color unpleasant and acidulous.

MUSICAL ART SOCIETY CONCERT, DECEMBER 15.

World.

The tenors were noticeably satisfying last evening.

Times.

The chorus seemed somewhat less good than it has in some previous seasons; less good in quality of tone, particularly in the tenors.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT, DECEMBER 17.

Herald.

Ferrari-Fontana was in good voice.

Globe.

Mr. Ferrari-Fontana sang "Adelaide" with distinct effectiveness.

Sun.

On the whole, he sang "Adelaide" with taste and fecling.

Herald.

"Scheherazade" was played so well that admiration was aroused for the technical side.

World.

In other respects the performance was interesting for the sonority of the instruments, the variety of nuance, and the admirable playing of the many incidental solos by the concertmeister. . . .

World.

. . . The performance was interesting for . . . the admirable playing of the many incidental solos by the concert meister, Maximilian Pilzer.

Sun.

The beauty of Ferrari-Fontana's voice made a strong appeal.

Sun.

The performance of the orchestra was of much interest. The compositions it rendered were well adapted for affording a display of power in fine tonal balance, brilliance of finish and the building of dramatic climaxes. These are all qualities in which the organization has excellent resources and its work last night again drew richly upon them and thereby added to a fine record of past achievement.

Times.

Ferrari-Fontana's voice was not at its best.

Evening Post.

He sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" very badly.

Telegraph.

His version of Beethoven's "Adelaide" was forced, oversentimental, windy, and suspirated. Rarely have we heard such a parody. . . .

World.

Mr. Stransky's men can play "Scheherazade" with more unanimity than they did last evening. The raggedness of attack was the principal flaw in the performance.

Times.

The players did not seem in their best form, either collectively or in the solo passages which occur with some frequency in the music performed.

Press.

The concert master Maximilian Pilzer, came far from doing justice to the important violin soli.

Press.

His voice lacked the resonance one recalls in his singing last winter . . . his tones showed a constant tendency to fall below the correct pitch.

Press.

Throughout the concert the tone of the orchestra was below the usual standard of euphony, and more than a few technical slips added to the disappointment of critical listeners.

JAN SICKESZ RECITAL, DECEMBER 17.

Press.

In the Schumann fantasia there could be no doubt that Sickesz is not only a pianist with a good technical equipment, but with enough temperament, in the best sense of the word, to speak its message with certainty.

Mail.

He has now advanced to the front rank in his art.

Mail.

He was at his best in the Schumann fantasia to which he gave just the right balance of poetic feeling and magnificent strength.

Tribune.

His tone was warm, his touch delicate. . . .

Sun.

Schumann's great fantasia in C, lay beyond the range of the pianist's expression. He played it superficially, with something like correctness, but without communicative emotional quality.

Tribune.

It was not the playing of a thoroughly mature artist.

Sun.

Schumann's great fantasia in C lay beyond the range of the pianist's expression. He played it superficially . . . without communicative emotional quality.

Mail.

Mr. Sickesz is a player of the energetic type, working hard for his effects, and caring little for ease or grace. His hammer-like touch gives a virility to his interpretations.

"TOSCA," DECEMBER 17.

Scotti, in his best form vocally. . . .

Sun.

Mr. Scotti had a nasal cold and his singing mechanism was in a very uncertain condition.

Staats Zeitung.

On the concert platform this singer is not happily placed.

Mme. Fremstad conformed without seeming effort to the requirements of a song recital.

Herald.

A large audience applauded liberally.

Globe.

The songs were pitched to reveal all its (her voice) beauties of quality and expressiveness.

Eve. World.

None could fail to be impressed by its inherent beauty, by its capacity for transmiting sentiment. . . .

Globe.

It was marked by art of the sincere and elevated kind that we associate with this particular singer, by the absence of every meretricious appeal, by the welcome unconventionality of certain features.

Carnegie Hall was half full.

Herald.

The singer's voice did not charm with the beautiful quality of tone which it once possessed.

Sun.

The voice seemed unusually dull and wanting in vitality.

Sun.

The entertainment suffered greatly from the monotony of the artist's delivery.

Sun.

In songs calling for playful humor she was not at all convincing though here her clear enunciation helped her much.

Globe.

Her voice was in good condition. . . . Her command of tone color had satisfying play. . . . Her voice responded, to the demands she made on it.

Sun.

Mme. Fremstad was heard to the best advantage in the songs which called for the tones of her middle and upper scale.

Sun.

She was happiest in Hugo Wolf's "Geh, Geliebter."

World.

Her enunciation was seldom clear.

American.

Her tones were for the most part, dry and somewhat pinched.

Tribune.

Mme. Fremstad was in excellent voice in her middle and lower registers; her upper was less admirable.

Press.

She achieved her most impressive results in Schumann's "Der Spielmann."

Summing up the impressions gleaned from a perusal of the foregoing quotations we have come to the definite conclusion that Mme. Gabrilowitsch's voice is both beautiful and not beautiful; she should and she should not sing with power; the tenors were good and they were not good at the Musical Art concert; Ferrari-Fontana's voice was at its best, but it was not in good condition; its beauty made a strong appeal, but it lacked resonance and fell below the pitch; he sang "Adelaide" badly, in a forced, oversentimental, windy and suspirated manner—in fact, gave a parody of it—and yet he sang it with taste, feeling and effectiveness; in "Scheherazade" the Philharmonic Society aroused admiration for its technic, but the principal flaw in its performance was the raggedness of the attack; Maximilian Pilzer played the incidental solos admirably, but came far from doing justice to them; the orchestra made technical slips, but on the other hand played with brilliance of finish; Jan Sickesz performed the Schumann fantasia superficially, but he spoke its message with certainty; he is in the front rank in his art, but does not play like a mature artist; he was at his best in the fantasia, but it lies beyond the range of his expression; his touch is delicate, but hammerlike; Scotti, in his best form vocally, had a nasal cold which put his singing mechanism into a very uncertain condition; Olive Fremstad, not in place in concert, answers easily to the requirements of concert; she drew a large audience, but the house was half full; her voice lacked beautiful quality of tone, but revealed all its beauties of quality; it was dull, but it impressed with its inherent beauty; the concert was monotonous, but welcome in unconventionality; her clear enunciation seldom was clear; her dry and pinched tones revealed tone color and proved that her voice was in good condition; her upper scale showed her at her best, but her upper register was less admirable than the others; the best thing she did was a song by Wolf, but better still was one by Schumann.

Is it possible that, with the prescience of genius, Milton saw in his mind's eye last week's New York daily newspaper music reviews when that great poet wrote about "confusion worse confounded"?

CHARPENTIER HEARD FROM.

It is known that Gustave Charpentier founded the Conservatoire de Mimi Pinson, out of gratitude for the success of "Louise," the opera comique in which he set to music part of the life story of a Parisian work girl.

The Conservatoire Mimi Pinson was intended to provide honest fun and amusement for those hard workers whose fingers rarely cease plying the needle.

"What has become of this gracious conservatoire since the horrors of war has flooded humanity?" asks J. F. Delma-Heide, in a letter to the MUSICAL COURIER, and he answers his own question: "Having met Gustave Charpentier, I asked him the question, and he was good enough to tell me that he had just returned from Dieuze, his native village in Lorraine, where all 'were filled with high courage and hope for final victory, though the present days are dark and dreary.' Charpentier's own brother is among the dead. He said to me: 'One must have the courage to be smiling though in deep sorrow, and I have come to see after "Mimi Pinson" and the musicians. I shall ask that concerts may recommence. Music can console until that moment when our victories must be vocalized. Why interdict music and absinthe; are the two on a level?

"'As to "Mimi Pinson," it is with pleasure I have seen her in ambulances and workrooms, thinking of the needs of others though her own go unsupplied.

"'One Mimi Pinson told me yesterday that her lover had lost an eye in battle, but was fighting on in spite of it. "Then, when will the wedding be?" I asked. "Just as soon as he comes back, for I love him the more," she answered.

"'Mimi Pinson asks to be allowed to be assistant nurse; her hard life often so necessitous has prepared her for the work. In about a month there will be 200 Mimi Pinsons in the hospitals.

"'They all have offered to go to the front, but they will be needed in the environs of Paris.

"'The young working girl, humble, ardent, generous, merits her place with the others in the golden book which France fills with heroic names. Has she not, smiling Mimi Pinson, replaced the rose in her bodice with the Red Cross symbol of Faith, Hope, Love?'"

KAHN QUITS CENTURY OPERA.

There is nothing to be said in comment upon the letter which Otto H. Kahn, of the directorial board of the Century Opera, sent to that body last Monday. It reads as follows:

Charles H. Strong, Esq., President, Century Opera Company.

DEAR SIR—When, in the spring of last year, the City Club of New York initiated the movement which, under its auspices, took shape in the formation of the Century Opera Company, I willingly accepted the invitation to cooperate in what I looked upon as a work of genuine cultural value to the community—with the reservation, however, because of the many existing claims upon me, that I should be free to withdraw when the undertaking was once fairly under way. Since then, through financial contributions and in other ways, I have demonstrated my serious interest in this endeavor to produce, in a dignified manner and in a spirit of serious artistic striving, opera in English at popular prices.

I believe the Century Opera has amply vindicated its call to exist. Having corrected the shortcomings necessarily incident to its first and somewhat experimental season, it has this year, throughout its performances, maintained a thoroughly meritorious standard in every department; it has given employment to young American artists for whom, owing to the very small number of operatic institutions in America, there is all too little opportunity in their own country; it has brought joy and inspiration to thousands of people of moderate and small means who have heretofore been denied the opportunity of listening to operatic performances. The souls of the people are hungry, and art, with those susceptible to its call, has power to nourish, as it also has power to soothe and heal, to stimulate good and to counteract harmful tendencies and impulses. The lowest priced seats (from 25 cents to $1) were crowded at almost every performance with an earnest, enthusiastic, deeply interested and appreciative public, whose attitude and expressions have made it plain that to many thousands the discontinuance of the Century Opera would be a keen disappointment and deprivation.

Unfortunately, the financial results of the Century Opera Company have not kept pace with its artistic results, and all efforts to obtain needed funds, either through additional subscribers to stock or additional contributors to a guarantee fund, have as yet brought no adequate response. Personally, as you know, I have contributed a total of $75,000, to the funds of the Century Opera Company and in view especially of the enormous and urgent demands for aid in relieving distress arising from the existing situation here and abroad, I do not feel justified in going beyond this amount under the present circumstances.

For a variety of reasons I have concluded that it is best that I retire for the time being from active participation in the affairs of the Century Opera Company and I therefore beg to resign herewith as a member of the Board of Directors. This does not mean that I shall cease to be interested in the movement for which the Century Opera Company and the City Club Committee on Popular Opera stand. On the contrary, my interest in that cause and my belief in its value to the community continue unabated and in due course of time I shall be willing, if it is desired and if circumstances warrant, to become again actively connected with it. Meanwhile, I shall be prepared, if needed, to duplicate any subscription which may be secured toward a fund of $50,000 a year for three years, to maintain popular priced opera in English, a sum which I consider more than sufficient because, with such economies as can henceforth be effected without detriment to any essentials of a worthy and meritorious artistic standard, the company ought, under generally normal conditions, to become very nearly, if not entirely, self sustaining. It would be particularly gratifying if a substantial portion of that fund could be secured in large numbers of contributions, say from $10 up or in even smaller amounts. From expressions that have come to me and incidents which I have had occasion to observe, I am hopeful that a campaign for small subscriptions and an appeal to thus give to the company a broad basis of popular support would meet with a considerable measure of success with that large portion of our people whom the Century Opera is primarily destined to serve and who, if I may venture the suggestion, might fittingly and with advantage to the institution be directly represented on the Board of Directors.

Yours very truly,
(Signed) OTTO H. KAHN.

HAMBOURG'S PLANS.

Mark Hambourg, who arrived in this country recently, has just finished a series of concerts in the New England States. During the latter part of January, Hambourg will give a piano recital in New York, and he purposes remaining in this country until the spring. His tour is under the management of Haensel & Jones.

DE RESZKES AT THE FRONT.

A letter received by Oscar Seagle, the baritone, from his friend, mentor and artistic associate, Jean de Reszke, is worthy of reproduction as showing the sort of life some of the prominent European musicians are living during these troublous days:

Paris, November 16, 1914.

MY DEAR FRIEND.—How nice of you to cable and invite me to go to America. Your telegram followed me in my wanderings to Paris, Tours, Deauville and finally Saint-Germain. All this on account of my son, who was traveling with his regiment of dragoons. You know the story of how he was admitted, after four days in the barracks, into active service at Meaux. He gallantly came through the campaigne of the Marne. He was wounded, however, by a shrapnel and made a corporal.

After coming back to the quarters of his regiment to change clothing and horses, he returned to the front at Ypres.

You know my poor wife and her unbounded love for him and can imagine her torment and anguish.

As for Poland, I had left Edouard with his family, Victor, my sister, and other nephews and nieces marooned on the banks of the Varts. For two and one-half months I have not had the slightest news from them. It is terrible and if conditions are as bad as the papers here describe, I have good reason to fear for the safety of my relatives. Under such conditions I neither leave Europe nor give lessons. I hope that Providence will spare us from harm.

Thousand kind regards to your dear wife and the delightful little Jean.

Your devoted friend,
JEAN DE RESZKE.

ORIGIN OF THE "WACHT AM RHEIN."

What is the origin of the "Wacht am Rhein," the favorite song of the German armies?

It had no Arndt, no Körner for its parent, not even was it the child of a national or of a university movement; it did not even come from the banks of the Spree; a village druggist named Schneckenburger, of Wurtemberg, is responsible for it and sent it forth in 1840, just at the time of the German war effervescence which made a rupture with France seem imminent. It was therefore contemporary with Becker's famous "Rhin allemand," to which Alfred de Musset gave such a virulent rejoinder.

The poet-druggist's "Wacht" had only indifferent success, but someone was found to set it to music in 1854 for the silver wedding of the hereditary prince of Prussia, the future emperor William I. Still, in spite of these princely auspices, the "Wacht" remained obscure. It was the war of 1870 which brought it to the front, the Prussians taking it as their battle hymn.

But the druggist-author never knew his late success, for he died in 1849, bequeathing his manuscript to one of his fraternity at Berne. The museum of Berne then became possessed of it, and Fate wills that the "Watch" in its original status rests in a neutral country.

DESPITE THE WAR.

Despite the war, the yearly meeting of the Paris Academy of Fine Arts took place not long ago in the French capital. This function, usually looked forward to by Parisian lovers of music as a chance to hear the work which obtained the Prix de Rome of the current year, differed materially from previous occasions of the same kind, for the Académie des Beaux Arts, because of existing circumstances, omitted music from its ceremonies. M. Dagnan-Bouveret, president, in opening the meeting, expressed his homage to those absent but to be found in the front ranks of the army doing their duty.

A TACTLESS ARTICLE.

A decidedly cavalier article in last Sunday's New York Sun accused some of the singers at the Metropolitan of "bawling," "bellowing," "shouting," "barking," "howling," "shrieking," "screaming," etc. A more intemperate or tactless article has not appeared for years in a New York newspaper. It is not criticism; it is abuse of the most immoderate kind and its tone hardly suggests regard for that etiquette and good breeding which even severe criticism of public performers should observe. The singers at the Metropolitan do not sing to anger or to please the newspaper critics, but are much more concerned in the effort to give satisfaction with their art to the managing director, the subscribers and boxholders, and the executive board. The MUSICAL COURIER has several able vocal and musical experts in constant attendance at the Metropolitan performances, but not one of our staff of opera reviewers has reported any of the barking, howling, bawling, bellowing, etc., which the Sun critic claims to hear at our opera house. What has come over the spirit of criticism in this city? Why is it necessary to substitute personal insult for calm and judicious discussion of faults which the critic thinks he finds? Mme. Matzenauer is accused by the Sun man of "shouting and screaming," and Carl Braun is reproached by the same gentleman for "barking." Both offenses were said by the well bred critic to have occurred in "Walküre." Two competent MUSICAL COURIER reviewers were at the performance in question and declare the singing of Mme. Matzenauer and Mr. Braun to have been not only good but even excellent. Of shouting, screaming and barking, nothing was noticed by the trained hearers just mentioned. The Sun critic has at one bound placed himself on the same level with that peevish professional music commentator who declared in one of our local dailies recently that he no longer would attend concerts of "musical small fry." So long as our resident and visiting artists are willing to put up with that kind of press treatment, that is the kind of press treatment they will receive.

AN INTELLIGENT ARTICLE.

It is a pleasure to note that the editorial department in a paper like the New York Evening Sun seems to have musical taste and a correct artistic perspective. As a rebuke to the senseless attacks which some of the other dailies make on Richard Strauss and his "Rosenkavalier," the Evening Sun recently published an editorial notice calling attention to the great success of "Rosenkavalier" with the intelligent part of the public able to recognize a masterwork when they hear it. "Wagner's 'Meistersinger,'" says the Evening Sun, "is a comic opera written in the grand manner. Strauss' 'Rosenkavalier,' a quarter-century afterward, is a work of the same special class—a comic opera by a composer of supreme eminence, written in the grand manner also, but tuned accurately in the key of the twentieth century. Its production was an event of importance in Germany; its representations at the opera here are recognized as performances of distinctive artistic brilliancy. The thing in itself is a masterpiece which compels admiring recognition as often as it is shown upon that great stage. When such a musician as Dr. Strauss sits down to write a comic opera something extraordinary is bound to come out; the score of 'Rosenkavalier' is in itself a liberal education to musicians and students of music. . . . Some are for Paul and some for Apollos, in their enjoyment of operatic music, but everybody recognizes this piece as an 'extra'—a glittering intermezzo—a performance whose appeal is unique and mastering."

SAINT-SAENS ON GERMANY.

It will be remembered that the Music Academy of Munich and the Association of Musical Artists of Munich wrote a letter recently to Camille Saint-Saëns informing him that he had been dropped from both societies as an honorary member because of his published manifesto against Wagner in particular, and the Germans in general. This letter was reprinted in the MUSICAL COURIER, and through the efforts of J. F. Delma-Heide (now in Paris) we have been able to secure M. Saint-Saëns' reply to the communication in question. For purposes of reference that missive is given again herewith, followed by the answer of the composer. Both letters were Englished by Mr. Delma-Heide:

Letter from the Music Academy of Munich and of the Association of Munich to Camille Saint-Saëns:

"It is with as much regret as astonishment that the German musicians have learnt through the press that you also have deemed it necessary to encourage the hatred towards Germany and German artistic culture.

"Although we comprehend what grief it must be to you to see France invaded by German troops, yet we thought that a man of your eminence could only be carried away in such a violent contempt for Germany if indisputable evidence of what we are accused were forthcoming.

"Considering all that Germany has done for you, it had been better to refrain from expressing yourself in such a cutting manner. Your works have been played by German artists in German theatres. You were nominated honorary member of the great reunion of German musicians to fête the centenary of Liszt at Heidelberg in recognition of your appreciation of this great musical genius. You have been fêted in German towns, entertained by a German prince in his own residence; surely all these reasons should have prevented you as a well-bred man from participating in the malignant tone of the press.

"If you permit yourself to criticize the music of Richard Wagner, allow us to point out that you are in opposition to the French musicians and writers who have warmly extolled this German genius.

"If you feel persuaded that Wagner insulted France, you must base the assumption solely on 'Une Capitulation,' a comedy which Wagner wrote in 1870 in old style. Upon a close examination, you would be obliged to admit that Wagner simply made a very innocent reply which the circumstances of the moment rendered justifiable to the Parisians who before the war made fun of our misfortune. This reply was not directed against your country so tragically tested, and Wagner's satirical attacks were directed against the vanity of a personality towards which he expressed a well-deserved sarcasm. The music of Offenbach was artistically antipathetic to Wagner.

"We trust that the truth will be put in evidence by you as your days decline.

"Munich, October 17, 1914.

"Académie de Musique.

"Association des Artistes Musiciens de Munich."

Reply of Saint-Saëns.

"GENTLEMEN—The letter which you have done me the honor to address to me through the press is courteous in form, for which I thank you.

"It is not difficult to give an answer to it.

"You speak of the General Association of German Musicians of which I consented, as a foreigner, to become a member upon the invitation of Liszt long, long ago, before the events of 1870. From the beginning I had difficulties in my relations with this society, and when later these increased, going so far as inaccurate accusations, I gave my resignation. Many years passed, then came the Heidelberg fête; I was invited to take part in it, and my gratitude towards Liszt forbade a refusal. On this occasion I was asked to re-enter the society. I accepted and was named an honorary member. Since that time the society has given many festivals, of which the programs have been sent to me, but none of my works figured thereon.

"I have not forgotten that German artists often have given my works, that the German theatres have reproduced my opera, 'Samson,' that I have received German orders. For all that I am grateful. What does it matter? Henceforth a river of blood and mud separates us. I can have no sympathy for a nation which treats signed treaties as a 'scrap of paper,' which destroys at Leipsic the costly treasures intrusted to it by France and England, which destroys heedlessly those marvels which time, wars of the Middle Ages and revolutions had respected; which massacres women and children, which causes civilization to degrade itself to the lowest of barbarisms, which blatantly announces its intention to enslave three-fourths of Europe.

"Richard Wagner has become the artistic personification of modern Germany; every good German erects his effigy beside that of his Emperor; Germany has used his genius to spread the German spirit into that of all nations. For this reason, I combat it and it is not my fault if Wagner, in putting 'Une Capitulation' in the complete list of his works instead of allowing it to be forgotten, has furnished a weapon against himself. Why should he speak of French mockings at the beginning of the war? What were they compared with the gross insults toward a vanquished enemy?

"I wrote some years ago: 'Formerly Germany was loved; now it is feared.'

"In these days, Germany is hated, execrated, and that hatred, that execration is deserved.

"(Signed) C. SAINT-SAËNS."

INTERNATIONAL.

From London Musical News is this:

The New York MUSICAL COURIER, of November 11, 1914, has the following paragraph: "The International Music Society of Leipsic has been dissolved because the war made it impossible to maintain the relationships necessary for its existence. Its most prominent members were Germans, French, English, Belgians, Russians. This year's annual meeting of the society was held in Paris, where Hermann Kretzschmar, the director of the Berlin Royal High School, was elected president. Kretzschmar recently resigned, and as all of the prominent Germans followed his example, the only thing to do was to dissolve the society, at least as far as Germany is concerned."

Passing over inaccuracies contained in the paragraph, we observe that the German members have no power to "dissolve" the society, even "as far as Germany is concerned," unless all the five national sections lying within Germany have severally determined to wind themselves up; and it seems improbable that that has occurred. Outside Germany, again, there are no less than twelve national sections, of which the United Kingdom and colonies form only one. The large majority of the members are found outside Germany.

We have already made our comment on the society as a whole on October 24 last. Those who at the present juncture hold technically the balance of central executive authority conceive it their duty to take advantage of that position, by maintaining the constitution of the society, keeping open its cadre, and waiting for better times. This they are resolved to do, holding it as an obvious duty not only to the existing members in the different parts of the globe and the past record of the society, but also and principally to the excellent international principle, which is the society's basis, and which was originated in Berlin itself.

The war will not last for ever, and as we then said, there is nothing to prevent national sections from doing what they like in the meantime (which they are competent to do under the existing rules), and, when the war is over, taking joint action again as before. The position of the German members concerned in this case, as shown in cuttings from the American press, is perhaps obscure; in so far as it exhibits them in the light of wreckers of a fine society, which was originally their own creation, they have not our sympathy.

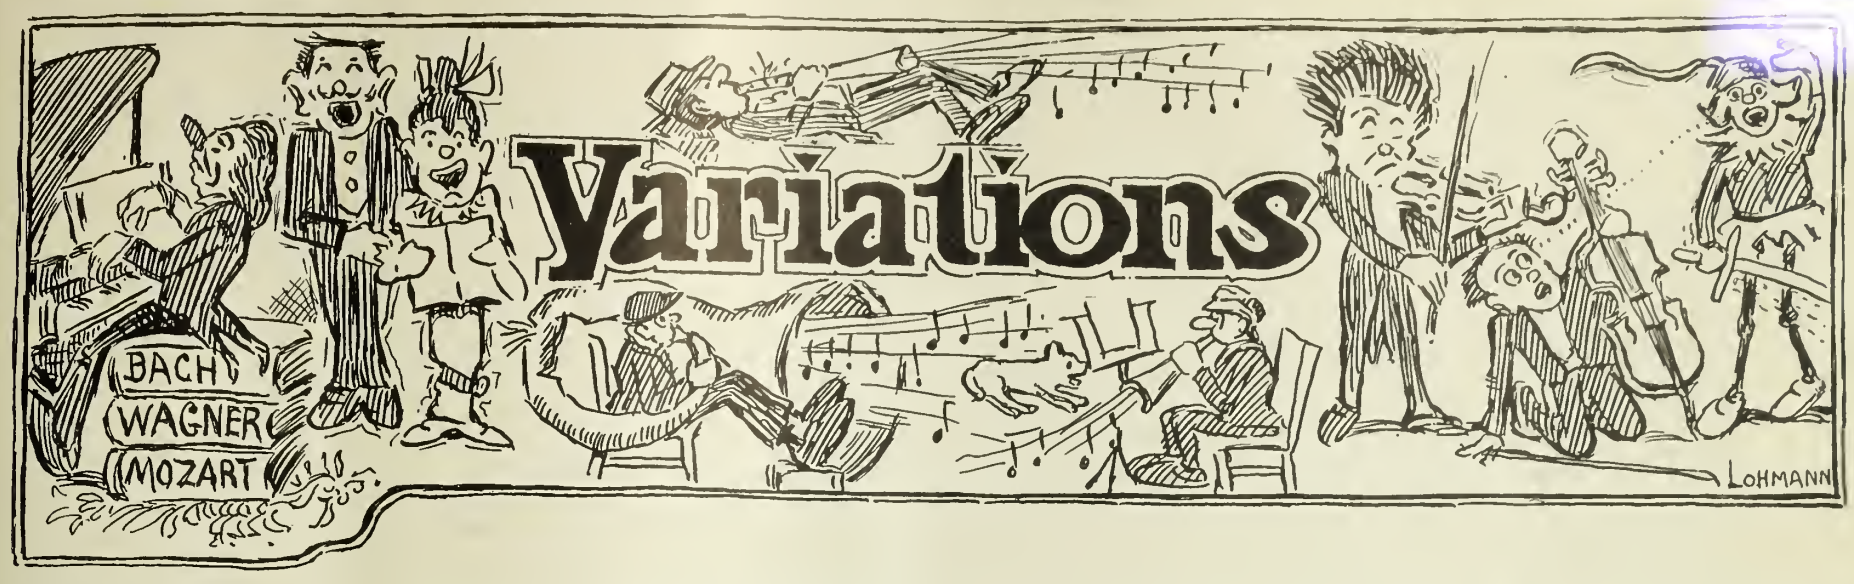
ON ELGAR'S "GERONTIUS."

Elgar's "The Dream of Gerontius" is not held in very high esteem by the MUSICAL COURIER, but it appears that some persons like it, and this paper is too wise to quarrel with anyone for not sharing in its musical opinions. Time is the best adjudicator to settle such questions and the MUSICAL COURIER can afford to wait, for it will be here to receive the verdict long after everyone concerned in the present discussion shall have passed on to that bourne whence no traveler returns and where the only music is that of the angelic choir and the celestial harp orchestra. Perhaps, however, some of Elgar's music will be in their repertoire. Let us hope, in such an event, that those who differ from us will be in the place where the heavenly concerts are held.

Walter Damrosch wrote a letter to the New York Sun a week or so ago deploring the lack of public interest in "The Dream of Gerontius" and in oratorio generally. Mr. Damrosch confounded the two subjects. The public is interested in the right kind of oratorio, but not in uninspired works like "The Dream of Gerontius" and "Hora Novissima," to name only two modern products. The one is operatized choral writing with orchestration savoring of Wagner, and the other is a long winded exercise in vocal counterpoint, with schoolmaster instrumental accompaniment.

A few days after the Sun published the Damrosch letter, one of the readers of the paper retaliated with an answer which is so strong, so dignified and so correct that it disposes of the subject finally, and on that account we reprint the communication in our own columns:

To the Editor of the Sun—Sir: Mr. Walter Damrosch's letter deploring the lack of appreciation by the people of New York City of Elgar's "Gerontius" leads me to suggest that perhaps there are reasons for this other than those referred to by Mr. Damrosch. Since there is no indication of a lack of appreciation of symphonic music by what he calls "our great middle class," and since symphonic music represents one of the highest types of musical art, one is led to ask if the trouble is not with the oratorio rather than with the public. It is doubtless true that American adults do not sing and that they care little for choral music, but I prefer to think them discriminating enough to realize how few choral compositions there are on the high level of the greatest symphonies.



If one tests "Gerontius" by the laws of good art one finds is considerably below the highest standard—below, for example, the fifth symphony of Beethoven and the fourth of Brahms. "Gerontius" is to a certain extent artistically incoherent; the two symphonic masterpieces will bear in this respect closest inspection. The oratorio form has always been somewhat anomalous, sometimes through containing too great disparity of styles—i. e., with too low an organization (as in "The Messiah"; sometimes as in "Gerontius") because the text is relied on to hold together a musical structure that is not self-supporting (the kind of structure that, in opera, is made possible by action). "Gerontius" is a sacred opera without scenery, costumes or action. It will not bear comparison with Brahms' "German Requiem" as to either musical coherence or profundity of thought. From the point of view of the musical expert it is full of interest, but eventually the public comes to realize that it lacks something of artistic intelligibility; that in spite of its separate and individual beauties it is not, as a whole, satisfying.

Mr. Damrosch has doubtless conducted "Gerontius" many times and has a professsional's love for it, but just as professional hate could not kill one of Beethoven's symphonies (though it tried hard enough) neither can professional love raise "Gerontius" one inch above its real level, a level which the force of public opinion and taste finally adjusts. BUSONI COMING.

M. H. Hanson has received a cable from Ferruccio Busoni stating that he would sail from Genoa on January 6 by the steamship Rotterdam. Busoni will be accompanied by his family and servants and plans to remain in America all summer.

We Apply for a License.

We are in receipt of the examination papers of the Minnesota Music Teachers' Association, and we herewith make application for a license, submitting, in accordance with the requirements, our answers to the printed questions of the examining board. We hope that the fact of our having selected the questions we desired to answer will not militate against our chances of receiving the coveted certificate and permission to ply the teaching trade. Questions and answers are subjoined:

Q. What do you understand by piano technic?

A. Technic is something for which pianists get the devil when they haven't enough of it and for which they get the devil when they have too much of it. The lack of technic often may be concealed by playing slowly and with much feeling and using plenty of pedal.

Q. Name and define three principal varieties of piano touch.

A. Pin finger touch, mucilage touch and pile driver touch.

Q. Describe the mechanism of the damper and una corde pedals.

A. They have two straight sticks and metal foot rests and look something like a large dollar sign. On our piano the una corde pedal usually squeaks.

Q. What is a sonata?

A. There must be a mistake in this question. Should it not read: "Why is a sonata?" Assuming the error to exist, we take the liberty of making the correction, on the next line.

Q. Why is a sonata?

A. Well, we don't know that, either.

Q. Name and define twenty musical terms occurring in piano music.

A. "I played this perfectly at home," "I can't remember the beginning, but some of it sounds something like this," "I wish they wouldn't put in so many sharps," "Did I skip a page? I didn't notice it," "Yes, mother, I practised just one hour." We know fifteen more of these and will furnish them if it is absolutely necessary.

Q. Who invented the pianoforte?

A. Heaven only knows.

Q. Name the two outside pedals on the pianoforte.

A. The right and the left.

Q. What is an Invention?

A. When a pupil writes. "I cannot resume my lessons this fall, because"—and then states the reason.

Q. Who wrote the "Well Tempered Clavichord?"

A. We do not swear.

Q. What course should you pursue with a pupil who has long tapering fingers, the first joints naturally curving outward? and with one who has short, stubby fingers and compact wrists?

A. Put the fingers through a clothes wringer.

Q. What course would you pursue with a pupil who is overtemperamental and who does not use any judgment?

A. Speak to her mother privately.

Q. Name five eminent pianists living, and mention their distinguishing characteristics.

A. Josef Lhevinne—spells his name with an H. Leopold Godowsky—wears a fur coat. Alberto Jonas—plays tennis in an armory. Olga Samaroff—always rises after finishing the last measure of a concerto in public. Ourself—we do not eat rice in any form.

Q. What do you think is the best method of breathing, and why?

A. Through the nose or mouth, because it is not advisable to use the ears or eyes for that purpose.

Q. What would you do with the voice of a beginner?

A. Treat it with cyanide of potassium.

Q. Define the following terms: Chorale, canon, pedal point, passacaglia, three inch pressure, mixture 3 rank, free reed, composition pedal, modulation, transposition.

A. We know nothing of automobiles.

Q. Outline a course of study covering the first year of vocal training.

A. Take eight lessons, sing constantly for your friends, insist on a hearing by Gatti-Casazza and if he does not engage you, say that you are as good as if not better than certain artists now at the Metropolitan and accuse Gatti-Casazza of being prejudiced against real talent and against Americans.

Q. When would you suggest a study of oratorio and opera?

A. About half past two.

Q. Name ten famous song composers.

A. Irving Berlin, Charles K. Harris, Kerry Mills, Lou Hirsch, Gus Edwards—but why go on?

Q. What would you teach a beginner during the first lesson?

A. To use the door mat on rainy days, refrain from eating garlic just before the lesson, and always pay in advance.

Q. What do you consider the most helpful and indispensable studies written?

A. "One Hundred Ways to Use a Punching Bag" and "How to Play Draw Poker."

Q. How would you correct the heavy, scratching tone sometimes encountered in developing martele staccato?

A. Strike the offender a heavy blow in the face, or pinch him or her severely in the fleshy part of the arm.

Q. Name the external parts of the violin.

A. The outside, and-er-er-we forget the rest.

Q. What is the difference between an oratorio and an opera?

A. About five dollars.

Q. How can you overcome throaty singing?

A. Keep quiet.

Q. In what respects did Wagner's idea of opera differ from that of his contemporaries?

A. He desired to make more money than they did; he hated to pay his bills; he invented the light motif and the darkened auditorium.

Q. What influences outside of music greatly aided the growth of the romantic movement?

A. Kissing, moonlight boating, dancing and the evolution of the corset.

Q. What was the difference between French and Italian opera of the eighteenth century?

A. We don't know. Those singers always are fighting about something or other.

Q. Compare the organ music of France, Germany and England.

A. We are neutral.

A Good Idea.

A practical and very timely thought is that of Mr. and Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, who suggest an excellent way to celebrate Christmas and help the Red Cross at the same time. The Gabrilowitsches are sending out this engraved card:

> TO OUR FRIENDS.
> In consideration of the immeasurable need and suffering which prevail in Europe at this season, we have determined to send all our Christmas presents to the Red Cross and beg our American friends not to doubt our well wishing thought of them on Christmas day, despite the fact that we give them no material proof of it.

Chicago Will Be Pleased.

Mary Garden has landed on our shores, and to a Tribune reporter she said, as she landed on our shores: "Opera? What is that?" A pretty sarcastical paragraph could be constructed out of this, but we prefer to let some one else do it. Personally we like Mary's performances, opera or no opera.

Yes, Sir.

Sirs are almost as numerous among British musicians as iron crosses among German soldiers. In a recent paragraph in the London World reference is made to Sir Henry Wood, Sir Hubert Parry, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Frederick Bridge, and Sir Charles Stanford, all of whom excepting the first, conducted works of their own.—New York Evening Post.

Rosenthal's Alibi.

Moriz Rosenthal, facetious as ever, wrote to his English managers not long ago, cancelling his tour in Albion. He remarked at the end of his letter: "I hope that my friends in England are my friends still. I didn't start the war, you know."

Making Music Neutral.

Clarence Lucas says that if music had a censor we might get notices like this:

It is semi-officially reported from ——— that the well known singer ——— ——— was enthusiastically received by the public at ——— on the occasion of a grand benefit concert in the ——— hall, and that Manager ——— has been compelled to announce another concert in the same city next ———, which necessitates cancelling all the appearances of ——— ——— at ——— ——— ——— ——— during the week of ——— ———.

Our Contest.

Can you tell, quickly, and without referring to your collection of orchestral scores, to which well known symphony the following detailed description applies? It was published recently in the program book of one of the large American symphony orchestras. If you recognize the work, send us your guess, your name and your address, and we will enter you as one of the competitors in our prize contest. The first example we gave was Brahms' E minor symphony and last week's notes referred to Tschaikowsky's B flat minor piano concerto. Fourteen guessed the former and twenty-one the latter. Altogether we have received fifty-nine guesses in the great contest. Here is this week's puzzle.

I. "The principal subject begins at once in the violins over an agitated figure in the violas. The transitional passage leading to the second theme begins with the material of the opening subject p, but a new idea appears eight bars later, f. The second theme, in B flat major, is announced by the strings and—in the second and third measure of it—by the oboe and bassoon. Following this there is heard some development of the principal subject, and the exposition is then given repetition. The development is concerned entirely with the principal theme. The recapitulation presents the chief themes much as before; the transitional passage is almost twice as long as that in the exposition, and the second subject is written in G major. The movement ends with a coda based on the material of the principal theme.

II. "This movement, like the preceding, is written in sonata form. Its first theme is really divided between the bass, and the figure taken up in succession by the violas, second and first violins. The little fluttering figure that occurs in the first violins after the repetitions of the theme is given important development in the second portion of the movement. The second theme is in B flat major and begins in the strings. The development is short, and is based largely on the fluttering figure previously referred to. It is followed by a recapitulation in which the principal theme and second subject are reheard, the latter in E flat major.

III. "This is constructed in the usual three-part form, the theme in three-bar rhythm. The trio, in G major is announced by the strings, piano, six measures later being continued by the woodwind. The whole character of the trio is in constrast to that of the opening portion of the movement. The third part repeats the first exactly.

IV. "With the principal subject of this closing movement a return is made to the passionate character of the first. The subject contains sixteen measures, divided into two portions of eight measures, each repeated. The transitional passage (thirty-nine measures long) is built on a bustling eighth note figure. The second theme, announced by the strings, is in B flat; the opening phrase is later taken up by the woodwind and leads to a forte section similar in character to the transitional passage. This closes the first portion of the movement. The development is made up of an imitative working out of the first two measures of the principal theme. This is followed by a recapitulation, the second subject of which is in G minor."

Maligned.

No, Eglantine, we did not allude to the tenor's "wobbling;" we wrote distinctly "warbling."

Sounds Like Delehanty.

Dear Variations: Would you kindly inform me as to who wrote that imperishable line: "I'd rather be a music critic than be right?" Thanking you for an early reply,

Very sincerely,

Stealing Kreisler's Stuff.

Kubelik is reported to be in the Austrian army and is said to have received a slight wound during the fighting in Galicia.

Cable Badly Wounded.

And, by the way, Mark Hambourg, the pianist, tells us that very recently a London paper published a squib about Kreisler to the effect that when he made his concert reappearance in New York he came upon the stage attired in his lieutenant's uniform and limping painfully, while his wife, dressed as a Red Cross nurse, accompanied him at the piano.

For Schiller Students.

Hans Hippel—"Do you like Wallenstein's 'Lager'"?

John Smith—"I've never tried it. Würzburger is good enough for me."

Hypothetical Case.

What would that boycotting English committee of musicians do if there came before them the case of a violinist with a German name who studied in Liège, plays Russian music with French elegance, likes Vienna rolls, smokes Turkish cigarettes, has an aunt residing in Amsterdam, N. Y., and has a copy of the Elgar violin concerto which he borrowed from a Servian colleague? Would such a person be allowed to play in an English orchestra?

Cincinnati Orchestra Plays Novelties.

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 18, 1914.

Two important novelties and a Haydn symphony comprised the program for the sixth concert of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra season this afternoon in Emery Auditorium. The concert was, on the whole, one of the most brilliant and interesting of the current year. Dr. Kunwald opened the program with the Haydn symphony, No. 98, in B flat. (No. 8 in the old Breitkopf and Härtel edition, further identified as No. 4 of the "Salomon" set of twelve symphonies composed by Haydn on his visits to London.) Ever fresh, and endowed with that spontaneity which marks all of Haydn's works, the symphony was given in gala style, working up to a splendid climax in the last movement.

Perhaps the most absorbing topic of the afternoon was the symphonic tone poem by Hugo Wolf, "Penthesilea," played for the first time by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The work deals with the fight of the Queen of the Amazons for Troy against the Greeks; the mythological "Feast of Roses" and Penthesilea's destruction of Achilles, and her own self inflicted death. The first movement is a graphic picture of the departure for battle and the encampment of the hosts of Amazonians at nightfall. Penthesilea's dream, which follows, is an interlude of rare beauty and charm. The final scene depicts "Combats, Passions, Frenzy and Annihilation," and the orchestra pictured eloquently all that these dark titles convey to the imagination. The work was given a vigorous and wholly dramatic reading. Another novelty was the Smetana symphonic poem "Vysehrad," orchestrally brilliant and very effective, with moments of great poetic beauty. In these two works the orchestra displayed its technical efficiency and tonal splendor to good advantage.

Dr. Fery Lulek, baritone, was the soloist. He sang the aria "God Have Mercy," from "St. Paul," and two songs, "Salomo" and "Die Drei Wanderer," by Hans Hermann, most skillfully orchestrated by our local composer, Louis Victor Saar.

Dr. Lulek's voice is limited in range, but rich and resonant. His sense of the dramatic and his artistic interpretation are in themselves great assets for a singer. In response to demands for an encore he sang Bohm's "Still Wie Die Nacht" with beautiful legato and convincing sentiment.

JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Mme. Rappold to the Rescue.

Had not Marie Rappold, who has only recently returned from Europe, stepped into the breach for the Philadelphia performance of "Aida," Tuesday evening, December 15, the Metropolitan Opera Company might have found itself without a singer for the title role, for Emmy Destinn, who usually sings this part, was seriously incapacitated up to the last hour, because of a severe cold.

Although she is reported not to have sung Aida for three years. Mme. Rappold, when called upon by the opera directors, essayed the role with only a preliminary running over the score with Conductor Giorgio Polacco at the piano. Her success is truly said to have been astonishing under the circumstances.

Of her work, the Philadelphia press spoke in highest praise on the following day. She not only "looked the part," but her portrayal was "lithe and buoyant." Her voice was referred to as "lovely and sympathetic," her interpretations as "worthy." "Performance admirable," "decided success," "unaffected sincerity," "appealing pathos" and "Rappold left little cause for regret" are all expressions used by the local press in their story of her "real triumph."

MARIE RAPPOLD.

Harrison-Irvine Musicales.

A pleasant feature of the musical season in New York each year is the series of Sunday afternoon receptions to people well known in the music world, given by Jessamine Harrison-Irvine, at her studio in Carnegie Hall. The first reception of this season was held on Sunday afternoon, December 6, and was in honor of Regina de Sales, the vocal teacher of Paris who recently came to this country. The music on this occasion was furnished by Pauline Giesselmann, pianist, assisted by David Hochstein, violinist. Miss Giesselmann, who is but sixteen years of age, is the MacDowell Club scholarship pupil of Thuel Burnham, the Parisian pedagogue, for whose studio she is preparing under the guidance of Mme. Harrison-Irvine. She played a composition by Bach, a Beethoven sonata, four Chopin numbers, and a group by modern composers, giving each number a careful interpretation and displaying a thoughtfulness beyond her years.

Mr. Hochstein played compositions by Schumann, Brahms, Elgar, Tschaikowsky, Paganini and Sinigaglia in a finished manner, winning much applause.

Walter Golde was a skillful and sympathetic accompanist.

Coale-Wright Joint Program.

On Sunday evening, December 13, in the Christian Union Congregational Church of Upper Montclair, N. J., the regular musical service was given by Bella Coale and the choir under the direction of Annola Florence Wright. This was the program: "Toccata and Fugue" in A major, Bach; "Pastorale" from the "Sixth Symphony," Widor; "Allegretto" in B flat, Goldmark; "Adagio" from "Symphony Pathetique," Tschaikowsky; "Madrigal," Simonette, Dickinson; "Toccata" in C, D'Every.

Following this, Mendelssohn's "Hear My Prayer" was sung by the choir under the direction of Annola Florence Wright.

Oscar Seagle's Recital Tour.

Oscar Seagle has been touring the West, South and Southwest in the intervals of his teaching in New York, where he has a studio for the winter. He has limited the number of his concert engagements in order not to interfere too greatly with the work of his pupils, but, as usual, he is much in demand and has already traveled rather extensively.

He was heard recently at a concert given under the auspices of the Alumnæ Association of the Northwestern School of Music, Evanston, Ill., where he sang a varied program, well illustrating his versatility. Among his selections were songs from the Old French, and Old Irish, numbers from Schumann, Brahms, Dvorak, from the modern French and some of the best of the American composers. He scored a flattering success. Frank Bibb, who accompanied Mr. Seagle, was represented on the program with an "Indian Elegie" which proved to be an attractive number.

It would be superfluous now to speak of Seagle's splendid art, but it may be added that his rendering of the "Prologue" to "Pagliacci" was a masterly piece of interpretation and showed the artist's wonderful skill in character delineation. Dr. Lutkin, dean of the music department of the Northwestern University, is said to have remarked after this concert that Seagle was undoubtedly one of the greatest living baritones, an opinion which was certainly shared by every member of the audience present.

Mr. Seagle was again heard in recital in Minneapolis on December 2, when a program differing in almost every particular from that just mentioned, but no less illustrating the baritone's remarkable versatility, was given. His interpretation of a set of French songs was especially commented upon as being unusually in accord with the esthetic tendency of the French school of today; and his remarkable ability to vary his tone color so as to suit every mood of the composer was noted as a piece of art which very few singers on the stage today are in a position to imitate.

Elsa Lyon in Newark, Ohio.

Elsa Lyon sang last night before one of the most critical and appreciative audiences Newark has ever summoned. . . . The perfection of language, the study of diction, the study in dramatic schools all have engaged Miss Lyon's best and constant efforts.

Last night's concert proved to every musical critic the scope of her training. Finished taste marked each number's rendition. No more dramatic interpretation could have been given without a company and costumes. The cool, even studious, technic dominated the entire program. . . .

From behind scenes came the Brangaene call, before the audience had seen the singer. Mellow, sweet, voluminous, clear, pure and lovely, sustained in perfect German came the warning cry. This was considered by many the finest number on the program.

A technical aria followed in Italian, difficult and superbly done, showing the full measure of her training.

Then came a group of four German songs of Brahms, absolutely different in meaning, and by contrast proving the singer's dramatic impersonation. . . .

The promise of her voice is great. Its growing soprano register has brilliant promise, and as ever her dramatic feeling so gracefully expressed carries truth in every tone.—Newark (Ohio) American Tribune.

And she sang well. The auditors were sympathetically responsive to her efforts to please, and with discriminating enthusiasm received the varied list of offerings. . . . The vast improvement noticeable in the artist's technical demeanor, the broadening of her musicianship, the intelligent comprehension displayed in her versatile renditions of numbers demanding a high order of mental and artistic equipment, made her appearance a veritable triumph. Her skill in impressing upon an audience the true meaning of the composition she was singing, in a language not familiar to the great majority, was consummate. . . . The intensity of passion in the love song from "Salome" was just as intelligible as if sung in English. The dramatic possibilities were made to show themselves by the intonations, as well as by the fervent appeal of the singer's skillful art and natural musical temperament. . . . Last evening's concert was one of true musical merit, as well as a personal success for this Newark young woman, who has by natural endowment and conscientious effort come to the front in the highest line of artistic endeavor.—Newark (Ohio) Daily Advocate.

Marshall Kernochan and "The Snugglers."

At a recent concert Marshall Kernochan's popular "Smugglers' Song" was performed. Seated in the audience the composer heard some young women discussing this particular song, following its performance. "It's a good song, but what a funny name" commented one of the girls. Scanning the program, the composer found the title had been printed "Snugglers' Song."

At the Pittsburgh national musical convention one of the speakers will be Hans Schneider, of Providence, R. I., whose topic is to be "Physiological Memory as Related to Piano Playing and Teaching."

GRAND OPERA IN NEW YORK.

Weber's "Euryanthe" Revived at Metropolitan Opera House—Double Bill Substituted for "Gioconda" Owing to Singer's Indisposition—"Boheme" Given in Brooklyn.

"Rosenkavalier," December 14.

Strauss' symphonic light opera, with its mixture of comedy and philosophy in the text and its mixture of humor and scintillating cleverness in the orchestration, is today the most interesting work to be heard at the Metropolitan outside of Wagner and one or two of the older Italian operas.

Great was the consternation of several of New York's aged and hysterical music critics when "Rosenkavalier" first made its way into New York, for it is written in a style which they do not understand and are incapable of assimilating. However, the public at once took to the new work and the moment the attendance warranted the retention of "Rosenkavalier" in the regular repertoire, the critics sheepishly stopped their diatribes and now some of them are beginning to write about the Strauss masterpiece as though they had recognized its worth from the start. All this is very amusing to observers who watch the musical doings of New York without becoming a party to the bickerings, intrigues and posings which infest the ranks of those in the active tonal circles.

Last week the cast in "Rosenkavalier" made even more certain of the opera's popularity by giving it a spirited performance. Margarete Ober was the mischievous cavalier and Otto Goritz the cumbersome Baron Ochs. Paul Althouse did with skill and taste his limited tenor bit. Frieda Hempel was in glorious voice and carolled as sweetly and smoothly as any nightingale. Hermann Weil, the Faninal, put excellent singing and effective histrionism to his credit. Elisabeth Schumann was a demurely attractive and very tuneful Sophie.

When all is said and done, however, the chief potency of "Der Rosenkavalier" lies in its orchestral score, which is nothing short of marvelous in contrapuntal mastery, harmonic charm, characterization, and in the flash and play of instrumental color. As an orchestral painter no greater man than Strauss ever has put pen to paper.

"Tristan and Isolde," December 16.

German opera held the boards also on Wednesdy evening, and again those who center their attention upon the orchestra rather than upon the stage, had a rare treat, an unalloyed one, in fact, for Arturo Toscanini had charge of the baton. He surcharged his players and singers with a fervor and a finish which are not apparent when other hands lead the Wagner works at the Metropolitan.

Jacques Urlus, whose Tristan has been admired here before, repeated his admirable presentation, ardently sung and passionately acted. Mme. Gadski put into her Isolde all the poetry, fire and vocal plenitude which always distinguish her reading of the role. She is a wonderfully satisfactory artist who never seems to be out of sorts or out of voice.

SCENE FROM "EURYANTHE" REVIVAL AT METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

Mme. Matzenauer, the Brangaene, makes that part stand out impressively by virtue of her temperamental interpretation and her artistic vocalism, tempered to suit each separate mood of her music. Hermann Weil and Carl Braun, in the deep toned measures, were a strong asset in the success of the evening, what with their resonant voices and authoritative participation in the drama.

"Tosca," December 17.

Robert Leonhardt as the Sacristan represented the only change in cast in the familiar "Tosca" as given at the Metropolitan. In the small role allotted to him Leonhardt acquitted himself ably. Geraldine Farrar, as the picturesque and pretty actress who carves so effectively, did her acting with excellent technic and her singing with a trifle of vocal forcing here and there. Martinelli's mastery of the role of Mario now is completely realized. All the uncertainty of his former efforts has vanished and he moves at ease both in the dramatic and tonal phases of the part. Scotti as Scarpia has fallen into set ways, which begin to savor of the mechanical. In smaller roles Sophie Braslau and Messrs. Rossi, Bada, Bégué and Reschiglian, helped the ensemble conspicuously. Toscanini conducted.

Double Bill, December 18.

Owing to the indisposition of Mme. Destinn, the season's first change of bill occurred on Friday and "Gioconda" was replaced by "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci." Mme. Gadski, not at all fatigued by her intense Isolde portrayal of two days before, put a wealth of passion and feeling into her Santuzza, which together with Luca Botta's vital Turiddu and Giorgio Polacco's warm and inspiring reading of the score, gave the Mascagni opera a vividness and grip that aroused the house to unqualified enthusiasm.

Also in "Pagliacci," Polacco stirred the pulses with his temperamental baton, and in this respect he was seconded ably by Caruso, the inimitable Canio, who loves to appear in that role and shows it in his every motion and his every tone. As Tonio, Amato ranks worthily with his tenor associate, and never fails to win ringing plaudits for his affecting delivery of the prologue. Lucrezia Bori, as usual, was a Nedda who filled the eye with her visible charms and wooed the ear with her sympathetic voice and its adroit employment. Presented by such a cast, it is difficult to say how many years "Pagliacci" will remain popular at the Metropolitan.

"Euryanthe," December 19 (Matinee).

The account of this revival will be found in the editorial section of the MUSICAL COURIER.

Metropolitan Sunday Concert.

The Sunday evening concert, December 20, had Fritz Kreisler as the "guest" soloist, and in Tschaikowsky's violin concerto and several short morceaux he pleased his hearers greatly.

Frances Alda sang a "Le Cid" aria and some songs with her customary care and taste and won well deserved plaudits.

Arthur Middleton very tactfully selected a "Messiah" excerpt as his big number ("Why Do the Nations so Furiously Rage?") and by avoiding concert performance of operatic music proved his true artistic conscience. His voice is fine in quality and flexible in employment and he shows rare sense of dramatic and musical values.

The orchestra played the "Rienzi" overture, the ballet music from Saint-Saëns' "Henry VIII," and Halvorsen's "Triumphal Entry of the Bojars."

BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

"Boheme," December 19.

Puccini's best opera was the offering of the Metropolitan Opera Company on the occasion of its fourth subscription performance of the season in Brooklyn last Saturday night. The beautiful auditorium of the Academy of Music held a large and appreciative audience, and the production was fully up to the Metropolitan organization's standards.

Lucca Botta, in excellent voice, gave a compelling and sympathetic delineation of the role of Rudolfo. Adamo Didur gave his familiar portrayal of Schaunard. Geraldine Farrar was a satisfying Mimi, both vocally and histrionically. Lenora Sparkes replaced Elizabeth Schumann, indisposed, as Musetta, and carried off merited honors in the grisette character. Andrea de Segurola was Colline, Paolo Ananian was Benoist, Pietro Audisio was Parpignol, Riccardo Tegano was Marcello, Robert Leonhardt was Alcindoro and Vincenzo Reschiglian was the Sergente.

Giorgio Polacco conducted with verve and always preserved a perfect balance of orchestral and stage forces.

Next Saturday evening, December 26, "The Magic Flute," will be presented in Brooklyn by the Metropolitan Opera Company.

Boston Orchestra Plays Schönberg.

The eighth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday afternoon, December 18, and Saturday evening, December 19. The program brought forth an unusual selection of orchestral works. The novelty was Schönberg's five pieces for orchestra, op. 16, heard here for the first time. The pieces, "Vorgefühle," "Vergangenes," "Der Wechselnde Akkord," "Peripetie," and "Das obligato Recitativ" gave the Bostonians a fitting impression of this composer's originality. The newspaper reviewers wrote many columns on the event, still none of them were willing to commit themselves entirely. The compositions at least created widespread interest in the local music world.

Florence Hinkle appeared as soloist and afforded her many admirers occasion to extend one of the warmest receptions tendered any artist this season in Symphony Hall. Miss Hinkle displayed her voice to splendid advantage in the Mozart number from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the Bruch "Ave Maria," from "The Cross of Fire."

Other numbers on this program were the Haydn symphony in G major ("The Surprise") and "A Faust Overture," by Wagner.

Bowes Studio Musicale.

At the Bowes' weekly studio musicale, Mr. Bowes sang three charming manuscript songs written by Mrs. H. R. Chambers. These were entitled "Lullaby," "Rose Bud" and "A Love Note." They are delightful in their freshness and spontaneity and met with favor.

Mrs. Chambers accompanied Mr. Bowes.

Violinist Kreisler, who is to appear at the Newark music festival, is one war refugee who will not be criticized for drawing the long bow.—Newark, N. J., Star.

KUSA-HIBARI.

(By Lafcadio Hearn, in The Phoenix.)

His cage is exactly two Japanese inches high and one inch and a half wide: its tiny wooden door, turning upon a pivot, will scarcely admit the tip of my little finger. But he has plenty of room in that cage—room to walk, and jump, and fly; for he is so small that you must look very carefully through the brown gauze sides of it in order to catch a glimpse of him. I have always to turn the cage round and round, several times, in a good light, before I can discover his whereabouts; and then I usually find him resting in one of the upper corners—clinging, upside down, to his ceiling of gauze.

Imagine a cricket about the size of an ordinary mosquito—with a pair of antennæ much longer than his own body, and so fine that you distinguish them only against the light. Kusa-Hibari, or "Grass-Lark," is the Japanese name of him; and he is worth in the market exactly twelve cents; that is to say, very much more than his weight in gold. Twelve cents for such a gnat-like thing! . . .

By day he sleeps or meditates, except while occupied with the slice of fresh egg-plant or cucumber which must be poked into his cage every morning. . . . To keep him clean and well fed is somewhat troublesome: could you see him, you would think it absurd to take any pains for the sake of a creature so ridiculously small.

But always at sunset the infinitesimal soul of him awakens: then the room begins to fill with a delicate and ghostly music of indescribable sweetness—a thin, thin, silvery rippling and trilling as of tiniest electric bells. As the darkness deepens, the sound becomes sweeter—sometimes swelling till the whole house seems to vibrate with the elfish resonance—sometimes thinning down into the faintest imaginable thread of a voice. But loud or low, it keeps a penetrating quality that is weird. . . . All night the atomy thus sings: he ceases only when the temple bell proclaims the hour of dawn.

Now this tiny song is a song of love—vague love of the unseen and unknown. It is quite impossible that he should ever have seen or known, in this present existence of his. Not even his ancestors, for many generations back, could have known anything of the night life of the fields, or the amorous value of song. They were born of eggs hatched in a jar of clay, in the shop of some insect merchant, and they dwelt thereafter only in cages. But he sings the song of his race as it was sung a myriad years ago, and as faultlessly as if he understood the exact significance of every note. Of course he did not learn the song. It is a song of organic memory—deep, dim memory of other quintillions of lives, when the ghost of him shrilled at night from the dewy grasses of the hills. Then that song brought him love—and death. He has forgotten all about death; but he remembers the love. And therefore he sings now—for the bride that will never come.

So that his longing is unconsciously retrospective; he cries to the dust of the past—he calls to the silence and the gods for the return of time. . . . Human lovers do very much the same thing without knowing it. They call their illusion an Ideal; and their Ideal is, after all, a mere shadowing of race experience, a phantom of organic memory. The living present has very little to do with it. . . . Perhaps this atomy also has an ideal, or at least the rudiment of an ideal; but, in any event, the tiny desire must utter its plaint in vain.

The fault is not altogether mine. I had been warned that if the creature were mated, he would cease to sing and would speedily die. But, night after night, the plaintive, sweet, unanswered trilling touched me like a reproach became at last an obsession, an affliction, a torment of conscience; and I tried to buy a female. It was too late in the season; there were no more kusa-hibari for sale—ether males or females. The insect merchant laughed and said, "He ought to have died about the twentieth day of the ninth month." (It was already the second day of the tenth month.) But the insect merchant did not know that I have a good stove in my study, and keep the temperature at above 75 degrees F. Wherefore my grass-lark still sings at the close of the eleventh month, and I hope to keep him alive until the Period of Greatest Cold. However, the rest of his generation are probably dead; neither for love nor money could I now find him a mate. And were I to set him free in order that he might make the search for himself, he could not possibly live through a single night, even if fortunate enough to escape by day the multitude of his natural enemies in the garden—ants, centipedes and ghastly earth spiders. . . .

Last evening—the twenty-ninth of the eleventh month—an odd feeling came to me as I sat at my desk: a sense of emptiness in the room. Then I became aware that my grass-lark was silent, contrary to his wont. I went to the silent cage, and found him lying dead beside a dried up lump of egg-plant as gray and hard as a stone. Evidently he had not been fed for three or four days; but only the night before his death he had been singing wonderfully—so that I foolishly imagined him to be more than usually contented. My student, Aki, who loves insects, used to feed him; but Aki had gone into the country for a week's holiday, and the duty of caring for the grass-lark had devolved upon Hana, the housemaid. She is not sympathetic, Hana the housemaid. She says she did not forget the mite—but there was no more egg-plant. And she had never thought of substituting a slice of onion or of cucumber! . . . I spoke words of reproof to Hana the housemaid, and she dutifully expressed contrition. But the fairy-music has stopped; and the stillness reproaches; and the room is cold, in spite of the stove.

Absurd! . . . I have made a good girl unhappy because of an insect half the size of a barley-grain! The quenching of that infinitesimal life troubles me more than I could have believed possible. . . . Of course, the mere habit of thinking about a creature's wants—even the wants of a cricket—may create, by insensible degrees, an imaginative interest, an attachment of which one becomes conscious only when the relation is broken. Besides, I had felt so much, in the hush of the night, the charm of the delicate voice—telling of one minute existence dependent upon my will and selfish pleasure, as upon the favor of a god—telling me also that the atom of ghost in the tiny cage, and the atom of ghost within myself, were forever but one and the same in the deeps of the Vast of being. . . . And then to think of the little creature hungering and thirsting, night after night, and day after day, while the thoughts of his guardian deity were turned to the weaving of dreams! . . . How bravely, nevertheless, he sang on to the very end—an atrocious end, for he had eaten his own legs! . . . May the gods forgive us all—especially Hana the housemaid!

Yet, after all, to devour one's own legs for hunger is not the worst that can happen to a being cursed with the gift of song. There are human crickets who must eat their own hearts in order to sing.

BALTIMORE BREVITIES.

213 Prospect Avenue, Roland Park,
Baltimore, Md., December 11, 1914.

The Loraine Holloway Memorial Association has been formed, with Thomas DeC-Ruth as president, for the purpose of publishing the unpublished compositions of the late Loraine Holloway. Mr. Holloway was well known for his organ compositions, and the members of the association feel that there would be a large demand for his posthumous works. The proceeds will be turned over to the composer's widow and child.

LADIES' GLEE CLUB.

The Ladies' Glee Club of Mount Washington presented an attractive concert on Tuesday night. Several numbers were sung by the chorus, of which Mrs. John W. Mealy is director and Helen Blake accompanist. The soloists of the evening were Sadie Perlman, a very pleasing violinist, and William G. Horn, whose beautiful baritone voice is well known in the local concert field.

CELLIST IN CONCERT.

Alfred Fürthmaier, cellist, was the feature of a concert given at the Belvedere last Friday night under the auspices of the Home Missionary Society. Mr. Fürthmaier's playing is full of feeling, and his intonation superb; he is an artist whose work is always enjoyable. The other soloists were Stewart Anderson, baritone; Mrs. Stewart Anderson, soprano, and Mabel Thomas, pianist.

SERIES OF MUSICALES.

The Garrison Country Club has inaugurated a series of musicales by local artists, of which the second was held Wednesday night. An enjoyable program was offered by Mrs. R. H. Joynes, soprano; Lala Jacobs, pianist, and Eugene Martenet, baritone.

BALTIMORE NOTES.

John F. Osbourn, the baritone, entertained the Men's Club of St. Michael's Church last Monday evening. Among other things he sang "Mandalay" by Oley Speaks, and "Brown October Ale" from "Robin Hood."

Nellie A. Norris, soprano; Elizabeth Gminder, accompanist, and Albert Gminder, cellist, appeared at the Woman's Club of Roland Park on Tuesday.

Merrill Hopkinson, baritone sang at the Y. M. C. A. service at Ford's Theatre, Sunday afternoon. D. L. F.

Tina Lerner with Toronto Choir.

Tina Lerner has been engaged by the Mendelssohn Male Choir of Toronto, for a joint-appearance in that city with Pablo Casals, the Spanish cellist. There will be two concerts at that organization's festival, and at both of these Miss Lerner and Mr. Casals will play. The dates set for the engagement are February 1 and 2, and the occasion will be one of unusual musical importance.

Tina Lerner is just bringing to a close a series of highly successful appearances on the Pacific Coast. A telegram to Loudon Charlton states that the pianist's third orchestral appearance in San Francisco December 14 was before a capacity house, and that Miss Lerner was given a tremendous ovation.

A Vera Kaighn Appreciation.

Vera Kaighn, the young and talented singer who holds the position of soprano soloist at the First Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh (one of the most important church positions in the country), formerly sang in Philadelphia in one of the leading choirs of that city. When she went to Pittsburgh she received this letter of appreciation from

VERA KAIGHN.

Fullerton L. Waldo, chairman of the music committee in the church in Philadelphia:

DEAR MISS KAIGHN—As chairman of the music committee of the Second Presbyterian Church, I desire to send you this unsolicited appreciation of your services in our choir and the expression of our regret that you are leaving us. Your selection last summer was from among sixty applicants of professional skill and experience—in itself a flattering testimonial. Your influence in the choir has been only for good, and has at all times made for the discipline and the morale so necessary to the maintenance of a successful choral organization. Your own work has been marked by artistic refinement and conscientious care.

Choir loft and pulpit and music committee unite in wishing you, in your new field of endeavor, that success which is sure to be your portion if your merits receive that recognition which they deserve.

Very truly yours, (Signed) FULLERTON L. WALDO.

Since September 1 Miss Kaighn, who is in great demand for concerts and recitals as well as private musicales, has appeared in recital at Asbury Park, N. J.; Ocean Grove, N. J.; Bellevue, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; with the Pittsburgh Orchestra at Pittsburgh; at Allegheny, Pa.; Cannonsburgh, Pa., and with the Mozart Club, Pittsburgh. Among her coming engagements are appearances at McDonald, Pa.; Camden, N. J., and Pittsburgh, in addition to her work with the Concert Quartet of Pittsburgh, of which she is the soprano soloist. The other members of this quartet are Elma Barker Sulzner, contralto; Will A. Rhodes, Jr., tenor, and Doyle Bugher, bass.

Cadman's Recent Tour.

Charles Wakefield Cadman, the composer, who now makes his home temporarily at Fort Collins, Col., returned recently from a successful and profitable concert trip into Michigan, Wisconsin and Illinois.

One of the important features of his trip was his appearance, together with his Indian vocal assistant. Tsiania Redfeather, of Denver, at the big music festival at Teachers' Institute at Kalamazoo, Mich., with the Russian Symphony Orchestra and Harper C. Maybee's chorus. The festival made a big feature of the Cadman compositions and the talented Indian girl covered herself with glory at every session by the naive and wholly artistic manner in which she rendered the Cadman songs. The composer was at the piano throughout.

His new trio in D major, which is attracting wide attention of serious musicians and chamber organizations, was presented on the last evening of the festival with Fradkin, the concertmaster, and Bernard Altschuler, cellist, with Cadman at the piano, and the three thousand people gathered in the Armory cheered the performance to the echo. The soloists appeared during this engagement before 12,000 people, and they are booked for a return date in that city next season.

Other places where Mr. Cadman's unique recital and informal chat on aboriginal music was given on this trip were Lansing, Mich.; Muskegon, Mich.; Grand Rapids, Mich., and Appleton, Wis., the former before the St. Cecilia Club. They had appeared at the home of Mrs. C. B. Kelsey, of Grand Rapids, in 1913, and this was their second appearance in that city, under the management of Eva Hemingway.

The two artists upon their return to Denver were greeted with a crowded house when the recital, together with the trio, charmed the Denverites. Mr. Cadman appeared recently in his "Morning of the Year" with the Presbyterian Choir at Fort Collins.

New York Praise of Mark Twain's Daughter

Clara Clemens Gabrilowitsch's song recital in the Little Theatre, New York, December 15, was even more successful than her joint appearance with her husband in Aeolian Hall. The contralto's rendition of a varied program showed her once more to be a singer of unusual attainments.

"In her lieder singing," said the Tribune, "she displayed considerable interpretative power, and a voice of not a little natural beauty."

The Sun referred especially to the singer's taste and insight, adding that her beauty of conception "sometimes rose to poetic heights."

The Times said: "She evinced a deep appreciation of the artistic significance of the songs in a program arranged with taste and discrimination. There were intelligence, poetry and depth of emotional feeling in her conception."

"The success of the event was immediate," was the comment of the American.

It was in the Press, however, that Mme. Gabrilowitsch's praises were sounded with special enthusiasm. "If Clara Gabrilowitsch had sung only Brahms' 'Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer,'" declared the Press critic, "she would have proved herself an artist of very unusual gifts. By penetrating deeply into the spirit of text and music, she made herself for the time being the living embodiment of the poetic character through whom the author and composer conveyed their message. . . . She revealed her interpretative powers in many other songs besides. Indeed, there was hardly one number on her list that failed to bring out clearly the American contralto's intelligence, her feeling for emotional value, her musical grasp, her command of diction, her sense of dramatic emphasis—in short, her skill in carrying home the meaning of the composer. Certainly it speaks well for her that she managed to concentrate the attention of the audience on herself when the exquisitely elaborated accompaniments of her talented husband claimed so much admiration."

Zoellners Please College Girls.

The Zoellner Quartet gave a concert at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., on December 2. In connection with this concert the Vassar Miscellany, the college paper, of December 11, had the following to say:

Vassar was again favored with a very delightful recital of chamber music on Wednesday evening, December 2. It was apparent from the very start that the members of the Zoellner Quartet were artists. The excellence of their ensemble playing was, of course, of prime importance, but there were plenty of occasions on which each player was able to show his or her individual skill. There was absolute unity about the playing. In faultless execution as well as in variety of artistic interpretation they showed themselves to rank with the best quartets that I have heard.

The program offered interesting contrasts. The first thing presented was a suite consisting of five numbers, "Romantische Serenade," by a modern Dutch composer, Brands Buys. The whole tone of these compositions was weird, unusual, but most fascinating. . . .

Then followed two numbers by a contemporaneous Russian composer, "Humoresca-Presto," and "Intermezzo Allegretto." . . . Both the numbers were very charmingly played, and gave such universal pleasure that an encore was demanded and received. . . .

In conclusion the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 2, was played. . . . In its rendition, the artists showed themselves to possess the true classical spirit which the composition demanded. Another encore followed, "Andante Cantabile from Quartet in F," by Tschaikowsky, . . . played with great sweetness and finish, which left the audience in a most exalted and inspired frame of mind. The whole concert was one of the most enjoyable performances of the year.

Vera Barstow in Toronto.

Vera Barstow, the clever young violinist who recently impressed her first Toronto audience so favorably, appeared again last evening in recital at the Canadian Academy of Music. The recital hall at the academy was entirely filled by an audience which gave Miss Barstow a most enthusiastic reception. She played two groups of selections and one single number and two encore numbers. In every instance she showed an exceedingly finished mastery of her violin, which, by the way, is an instrument of exceptionally fine workmanship. Her tone throughout was characterized by an even fullness and thoroughly musical quality which are rarely heard. The first number, the concerto in D minor, by Wieniawski, in three movements, was rendered with fine execution and temperamental interpretation. The beautiful full singing tones, which were a feature throughout, particularly marked her playing of the andante passages in the second part. A short number by Von Kunits, "Sarahande et Musette"; a minuette by Schubert, and a composition by Tirindelli constituted the second group, which was followed by a pretty gavotte by Gassic as an encore selection. The young artist's technic was shown to very good advantage in the last number, Spanish Dance No. 3, by Sarasate.—Globe, Toronto, November 28, 1914.

Vera Barstow, who last January made so fine an impression at the concert of the National Chorus, redoubled the esteem in which she is held by her recital at the hall of the Canadian Academy of Music. . . . In addition to a poetic quality that is truly individual, Miss Barstow has a very fine and authoritative style that at once places her en rapport with her audience. She has a beautiful tone and a technical equipment that are genuinely satisfying. Her chief number was the concerto in D minor of Wieniawski, which she rendered with a grace and clearness of execution and an appealing quality of tone. Particularly entrancing was her playing of the final allegro "à la Zingara." Her virtuosic gifts were also apparent in Sarasate's Spanish Dance No. 8. Her short numbers included a sarabande and musette by her teacher, Mr. von Kunits, which had attractive rhythmical qualities.—Toronto Saturday Night, November 28, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Leginska Engagements and Poem.

Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, won golden opinions from the press of Greater New York at her Aeolian Hall recital. She also won the attention of managers and concert directors to the extent that she has had many engagements as a result of her success. Worthy of especial mention are five appearances with the Symphony Society of New York, one at the regular Aeolian Hall series, one in Brooklyn at the concert for Young People, Academy of Music, one with Symphony Concerts for Young People, Carnegie Hall, and as soloist with the New York Symphony Orchestra, at Rome, N. Y., and Dayton, Ohio.

Following is a poem sent her, entitled "To Ethel Leginska, Pianist":

The sacred fire of Genius lights your soul,
And all the elements of Earth and Air,
Fire and Water, rise at your command,
As, summoned by the Magic of your hand,
They rush to do your bidding!
Young and fair,
You lure the lightnings from the purple cloud,
And snatch Jove's thunders from the whelming dark.
Anon, we hear the rapture of the lark
Thronging sun flooded meadows. Loud and clear
Earth calls to Heav'n! The Voice of God is here!
Your music lifts us to the stars and sun.
Its ecstasy brings back our vanished youth,
We thrill, we aim, we strive, we hope again,
And for a time, forgetful of our pain,
We dream of all the good we had achieved,
Had but the better self within us lived.

RUDOLF ENGBERG.

People's Home of Evanston, Ill. Mr. Engberg sang the aria "The Tambour Major" from Thomas' "Caid," scoring a huge success and being recalled time after time in acknowledgment of vociferous applause. Mr. Engberg is one of the most popular singers with the Swedish clubs and he has been in active demand at most of the saengerfests throughout the country.

Schumann-Heink and Stokowski Charm Philadelphians.

Philadelphia, Pa., December 19, 1914.

The pen of Max Bruch and the voice of Schumann-Heink—surely this is one of the master combinations of musical achievement; and this was the offering of Leopold Stokowski at the ninth pair of concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music this week. Schumann-Heink closely approximated perfection, and that is why it is safe to assume that those who call this Bruch recitative mediocre and others who declare it forced, and its outward pretence false, never have heard Schumann-Heink sing it. It is not an unfamiliar work at the concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra, but its weighty periods never bore greater majesty, nor its gathering crescendos more dramatic fervor than at this most recent presentation. Would that every vocal student in Philadelphia could have been present and taken a graphic lesson from this eminent singer.

Mme. Schumann-Heink's rendition of Adriano's aria from "Rienzi" also was excellently done. Stokowski followed this number with the "Rienzi" overture. The concert opened with a masterful interpretation of Schubert's C major symphony, No. 7. As the central orchestral work of the concert Stokowski gave Berlioz's "Love Scene" and "Queen Mab" from "Romeo and Juliet." This is surely a gem of music for all time. One would think from the programs of some conductors that they consider it a fine thing to put the name of Berlioz on their programs as a debt of gratitude for his mighty labors—as a sort of pay for his endless experimentation, if for nothing else. One would think this from the compositions they choose. It is the discriminative selection of men like Stokowski that is keeping before the mind of our musical historians the fact that among a lot of twaddle and bombast Berlioz wrote some great universal music. In these pieces Berlioz has caught one them of the great Shakespearean drama and photographed it in a composition of imperishable beauty. It would be a pleasure to hear these excerpts more frequently. H. P. QUICKSALL.

Singers in Desirable Vaudeville.

"Because of the scarcity of opera houses in this country and the comparatively small number of concerts given throughout the United States—that is, small when compared to the number of people who are singing in public and the vast amount of territory to be covered—many vocalists of genuine talent and ambition have accepted positions with leading vaudeville concerns throughout the country," says the manager of Winton Fischers, Inc., which may be characterized as a leading producer of high class acts to be used on various vaudeville stages throughout the country, and which makes a specialty of singing acts.

"Then, too," he continues, "such an engagement, when it is successful, is of genuine artistic merit, for the most exacting audience to be found anywhere is the vaudeville audience. This has been no small factor in raising that particular kind of entertainment to the high artistic and social position it occupies at the present time. The acts are dignified and there is no reason why singers should be prejudiced about entering this field of endeavor. Indeed, the acts which are most desired seem to be those which display the acme of classic dignity and artistic excellence."

Winton Fischers is located at 161 West Forty-fourth street, New York, and a survey of that establishment brings to view many unique features which tend to greater efficiency, among them being a theatre for the purpose of imparting stage "presence." Here it was learned that there has never been so great a demand for men and women with singing voices for the vaudeville stage as there is today; the inducements offered being large salaries, an interesting life and steady work.

Marie Morrisey and the High School Boys.

On Friday afternoon, December 11, Marie Morrisey, the contralto, appeared at the DeWitt Clinton High School (boys), New York, where an eager audience made up of two thousand boys listened to her broad and dignified interpretation of Gounod's "Divine Redeemer." She was sympathetically accompanied by Elsie T. Cowen at the piano and Mr. Donnelly (who has charge of the music at this high school) at the organ. She sang also Homer's "Banjo," and the boys liked it so well that she sang Rogers' "Wind Song," which is a story of the violin. After a great deal of enthusiastic applause, the principal of the school spoke for the boys and said they would relieve her from giving another encore provided she would promise to come again very soon. On her return the boys declared they would like to hear regarding the other instruments in the orchestra (they having already heard the violin and banjo songs), so Mrs. Morrisey, if she complies with this hint, will have to go early and stay late. Altogether, it was a most enjoyable occasion for all concerned.

Mrs. Morrisey appeared in recital at Waterbury, Conn., on December 13, receiving justly merited praise. Miss Cowen accompanied her there also.

Pittsburgh's New Manager.

The present musical season has brought forward another manager in Pittsburgh who seems to have caught the spirit of success, Edith Taylor Thomson.

Mrs. Thomson, a native of Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, has made her home in Pittsburgh since early childhood. Like many another English woman she is fond of outdoor sports and is an expert swimmer and oarswoman. She is the daughter of James G. Taylor, at one time a famous English oarsman who taught her how to row when she was six years old.

She has always taken a great interest in music and was for many years a member of leading church choirs in Pittsburgh, latterly turning her attention to writing on musical subjects and to concert promotion. For many seasons the Pittsburgh Festival Orchestra, Carl Bernthaler conductor, had her services as press representative and assistant to the manager, and at the present time she is publicity manager for the Mozart and Appolo Clubs and

EDITH TAYLOR THOMSON.

The Pittsburgh Male Chorus, as well as for many individual musicians of the city. Mrs. Thomson was also editor for a time of "Symphony," a musical publication of Pittsburgh.

Mrs. Thomson has handled the publicity for the London Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia-Chicago Grand Opera Company, Emma Eames, Emilio de Gogorza, Kitty Cheatham, David Bispham and other leading artists and has come to the fore more prominently this season as the manager of the Heyn recitals. Her roster of artists includes Mme. Gadski and Antonio Scotti, John McCormack, Mme. Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist, and Mme. Schumannn-Heink and her series has attracted larger audiences than anything given in Pittsburgh this season. Roman H. Heyn of the Hotel Schenley is guarantor and patron of the recitals, the business end being entirely in Mrs. Thomson's hands. More recitals by leading artists are to be given in the Heyn series next season.

In addition to her musical interests, Mrs. Thomson is secretary to the manager of a Southern insurance company and is also greatly interested in making a home for her son who is just entering young manhood.

Malkin Music School Concerts.

The regular Sunday afternoon faculty recitals and students' concerts given at the Malkin Music School, 26 Mount Morris Park, West, New York, always have interesting programs. At the last concert, a joint recital by Sophie Traubman and Maurice Kaufman, (members of the faculty), brought a program of ten vocal and violin works. Mme. Traubman sang an aria by Wagner and songs by Cadman and Gounod. Mr. Kaufman played the andante and finale from the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the Bruch concerto in G minor, and five ancient pieces by Italian composers of the Eighteenth Century. Mme. Traubman sang with her usual success, showing her excellent musicianship and mastery. Mr. Kaufman again proved himself an artist of rare qualities. He had to play a number of encores, delighting the audience.

Josef Malkin, the solo cellist of the occasion, member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared with great success as soloist with that organization in its home city last week. He teaches cello at the Malkin Music School, having begun last Sunday, December 20, at 9 A. M.

Eleanor Hazzard Peocock in Peru, Indiana.

A great crowd of Fortnightly Musical Club members and other music lovers greeted Eleanor Hazzard Peocock, who appeared in a song recital Wednesday evening. . . . A more artistic program has never been heard in Peru than the one which she sang. Her voice is a soprano, of power and sweetness, and she used it with ease acquired by excellent training and sympathy gained by love for her art. The song "Three Fishers," one of the Old English group, was vigorously applauded, and her dramatic presentation of an aria from "Herodiade," by Massenet, was wonderfully beautiful. The aria "One Fine Day," from "Madame Butterfly," Mrs. Peocock graciously repeated. It was a great privilege to hear so thorough an artist, and the Fortnightly Club was fortunate to secure an engagement.—The Peru Journal, November 27, 1914.

Members of the Fortnightly Musical Club are to be congratulated on the pronounced success of their first artist's recital of the season, which took place Wednesday night, . . . Eleanor Peocock, soprano, being the performer.

Mrs. Peocock was suffering from serious illness and kept her engagement in Peru in direct defiance of her physician's orders, but despite this disadvantage her program of varied offerings gave great pleasure to a large audience that was well satisfied with the work of the artist. The program was happily selected. . . . As a lieder singer Mrs. Peocock is perhaps most satisfying. She has much dramatic ability and sings everything with great expression. . . .

One of Mrs. Peocock's strong points is a very distinct enunciation so that the audience is never in doubt as to what she is singing about. . . .

A large audience greeted the singer, composed of the club members and many outsiders who were glad of an opportunity to hear such an artistic performance at home.—Peru Republican, November 27, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Franceska Kaspar Lawson, Soprano.

Among the busiest of the singers who make Washington, D. C., their home may be mentioned Franceska Kasper Lawson, the soprano. Mrs. Lawson's beautiful voice and charming personality make her a prime favorite wherever she appears.

She completed recently a tour of North and South Carolina, Virginia and West Virginia, singing before large audiences and at many schools and colleges. On December 7 she appeared in recital before the Woman's Music Club of the school of music of Converse College, Spartanburg, S. C., accompanied by Mary Hart Law, president of the club. Her program included the aria "One Fine Day," from Puccini's "Madame Butterfly"; a group of classical songs by Monsigny, Reichardt and Arne; a group of German songs by Liszt, Stange and Strauss; Russian and French songs by Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Bemberg; American songs by Rogers, Cadman and Huntington Woodman; three songs by Ronald, Thayer and Henschel; closing with the Indian bell song from Delibes' "Lakme." She was warmly welcomed and her work received well merited applause.

Gurle Luise Corey in New York.

An enthusiastic and convincing exponent of the Italian art of bel canto singing is Gurle Luise Corey, who, however, is American born and American trained. Coupled with a fresh soprano voice of excellent coloratura quality and a charming personality, she possesses a high degree of musical intelligence. Recently Miss Corey appeared at a concert held at the Congressional Library, Washington, D. C., before a select and fashionable audience. Her success was undeniable. She sings frequently in Washington, dividing her time between that city and New York when she is not on tour. Her thoughtful interpretations make her a general favorite among the schools and colleges of the South, and her appearances at these institutions of learning are frequent and very successful.

After filling a number of engagements before various clubs and colleges in Washington, D. C.; Woodstock, Va.; Farmville, Va.; Charleston, S. C.; Russelville, N. C., and other places, Miss Corey has established herself in New York for the winter, where her address will be Hotel Calumet, 340 West Fifty-seventh street.

Paderewski as a Poulterer.

(From London Music.)

Paderewski, whose generosity is famed all over the world, has been sheltering a large number of war refugees from Alsace on his beautiful estate at Morges, on Lake Geneva. The famous pianist, who has some large farms with prize pedigree stock, and some especially valuable show poultry, even went so far as to sacrifice some of the latter when food ran short, and the refugees were eating chickens that, on account of their rare strain, cost £20 to £50 apiece. Many of his horses were requisitioned by the Swiss Government for its mobilization. For the present Paderewski has cancelled his engagements in various parts of the globe.

Mme. Fremstad's Recital.

Olive Fremstad, as beautiful and fascinating as "herself," as on occasions when she has graced the operatic stage as Tosca or Isolde, sang a program of songs in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Wednesday afternoon, December 16. The announcement of the former Metropolitan Opera Company soprano's vocal recital had drawn many friends and admirers, and plenty of evidence by way of applause and floral offerings substantiated that she is a singer whose art is enjoyed and appreciated by a goodly following.

Her program offered a somewhat unusual, an unhackneyed combination of songs.

Four Schumann songs opened the recital; "Der Schatz gräber," op. 45, No. 1; "Abends am Strand," op. 48, No. 3; "Der Sennen Abschied," op. 79, No. 23; "Der Spielmann," op. 40, No. 4.

Following this group came four by Mme. Fremstad's countryman, Grieg. These were: "Spillemaend," op. 25, No. 1; Jeg reiste en deilig Sommerkvaeld," op. 26, No. 2; "Den Sarede," op. 33, No. 3; "Den Aergjerrige," op. 26, No. 3.

That Mme. Fremstad was in good voice, had been fully evident from the first number, and she used her organ with all the fine skill, taste and keen musical understanding which always have distinguished her art. It was gratifying to see that her long experience in opera, helped rather than hindered her delivery in the domain of the song unaided by scenic or costume appurtenances.

Three Wolf songs "Die Geister am Mummelsee," "Geh Geliebter" and "Elfenlied" offered splendid opportunity for versatile mood creation. Mme. Fremstad did not disappoint her listeners, for she found an endless variety of tonal and interpretative nuances with which to bring the numbers to eloquent hearing.

"When the Nightingale Sings" (ascribed to the Chatelain Coney, 1180), Old Troubadour; "Ma Gazelle," Moorish, of Algeria; "Hush-a-Bye Darling," Scottish; and "Tenting on the Old Camp Ground," American, represented the folksongs, and were given with deep earnestness and simple sentiment.

Tschaikowsky's "Le Soir," op. 27, No. 4; "Svarta Rosor," op. 36, No. 1, Sibelius; "Seraljen's Lustgard," op. 22, No. 1, Sjögren, and "Unter Sternen," op. 22, No. 12, Weingartner. represented another group in which Mme. Fremstad sustained fully the interest already aroused in the preceding selections. "Svarta Rosor" (Black Roses) and "Unter Sternen" stood out particularly among these. The Grieg songs made a hit of their own what with the beauty of the music and the intensely fascinating style of its delivery.

A group of insatiables gathered around the stage at the conclusion and requested encores, which Mme. Fremstad gave generously.

The vocal characteristics of so world famed an artist as Mme. Fremstad need no lengthy analysis in this city. It is sufficient to say that she still holds her own in the artistic vocal field and in so doing occupies a truly elevated place.

Richard Epstein supported the singer with thoroughly skillful accompaniments throughout.

Soder-Hueck Studio News.

Singers from the Soder-Hueck studio are continuously in demand for engagements.

Eda B. Tepel, lyric soprano, has been appearing as soloist with the Ladies' Choral Society of New Jersey, and pleased her audiences with the rendition of her songs. The German Staats Zeitung gave a review of her beautiful singing and fine appearance, and of her sympathetic rendering of a group of songs.

The following press notice appeared in the New Jersey Inquirer: "Miss Eda Tepel whose dramatic expression adds greatly to her fine soprano voice, sang a group of three songs and had to return for an encore, from which the audience refused to excuse her."

Marie de Calve, the mezzo-soprano sang on two different days at the German Bazaar, her fine work bringing her much applause.

Walter Heckman, tenor, who has been appearing in a grand opera act in vaudeville, has advanced rapidly this season, because of his studies under Mme. Soder-Hueck, so that he now sings a ringing high C with ease. He has just signed a contract doubling his income for the balance of the season.

Dr. Wolle in Lancaster.

An inaugural organ recital by Dr. J. Fred Wolle, of Bethlehem, was given last evening on the new pipe organ of Zion Lutheran Church. The entire church was filled by members of the congregation with their friends and the recital was thoroughly enjoyed by all. Dr. Wolle is an organ virtuoso of national reputation and is by no means a stranger to Lancaster people.

The following program was rendered: Prelude in E flat, "The Little Post Horn Air" (Bach); minuet (Shelley), melody (Jones), scherzo, from the second organ symphony (Widor), "Fragment from Lanier's Flute" (Sidney Lanier), overture, "Tannhäuser" (Wagner), "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde" (Wagner), theme and finale (Thiele).—Lancaster, Pa., Morning News, December 16, 1914.

Miss Preston's Musicale.

At Miss Preston's charming studio, Garden City, L. I., Wednesday, December 9, Valentina Crespi, gave pleasure to a distinguished audience by her superb playing of Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin. This young Italian is already a very accomplished violinist, and will doubtless soon have a large following. Miss Preston sang the air of Xavier Leroux with violin obligato. Mr. Janausch was [illegible] Betty Booker, formerly of Covent Garden, sang a delightful group of old Breton airs. Among those present were: The wife of the governor-elect Mrs. Charles Whitman, Mrs. Paul Morton, Mrs. Potter, Mrs. Charles F. Hoffman, Mrs. George T. CHICAGO SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PRESENTS TWO NOVELTIES.

One of the Works Is by Local Composer—Conductor Frederick Stock Tendered Informal Reception in Orchestra Hall Foyer in Honor of Ten Years of Baton Activity—Mendelssohn Club Concert—Apollo Club Postpones "Messiah" Performance —General News of the Week.

Chicago, Ill., December 20, 1914.

At the regular pair of concerts given by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 18 and 19, two novelties were presented. One, from the pen of Hans Pfitzner, a German composer, was an overture to Kleist's drama "Käthchen von Heilbronn." It has little to recommend it to symphonic conductors and the public showed its apathy by receiving the work most coldly. The other novelty, a three-movement symphonic suite by Adolf Weidig, the well-known Chicago composer, is a work of importance. Especially well built are the two first movements, in which Mr. Weidig's clever pen has put down music of great beauty, melodious and interesting. The work shows the composer to have an imaginative mind, the composition being original and inspiring and it is remarkably well orchestrated. The rousing reception accorded the composition by the public was in every respect justified. Other numbers on the program were the Wolf "Serenade" and the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture."

Frederick Stock directed the novelties and the two other numbers with verve and precision.

As ten years have gone by since Mr. Stock succeeded the late Theodore Thomas at the head of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the decade of good work was celebrated by an informal reception in the foyer of Orchestra Hall after the concert. Mr. Stock was the recipient of many glowing tributes well deserved by this still very young wizard of the baton.

Carl Friedberg's Chicago Debut.

The audience which greeted Carl Friedberg, pianist, at his debut in Chicago last Sunday afternoon was large and demonstrative—two unusual habits with the Chicago public. Generally, when a new artist makes his appearance in Chicago the audiences have been rather small and the public reticent in its approval. It might be stated, however, that Carl Friedberg's achievements had preceded him to the Windy City, and the glowing tributes paid him were in every way justified throughout his program, which was made up of the Rameau sarabande in E major; the Beethoven sonata, op. 109, in E major; the Schumann symphonic etudes; the Schubert impromptu and rondo in D major; the Brahms intermezzo in E flat major, and the same composer's rhapsody, op. 119, E flat major. Three Chopin numbers made up the last group, comprising the etude, op. 10, E major; valse, C sharp minor, and the ballade in G minor.

Mr. Friedberg belongs to the poetic and romantic class of pianists. His tone is of great beauty, suave and mellow, and his pianissimos were exquisite and delighted the ear. As a matter of criticism it might be said that the contrasts in tone color were not numerous. This fault was the only one to be registered against Mr. Friedberg. His technic is excellent and his playing most accurate. As stated at the beginning of this review, Mr. Friedberg's success as the hands of his hearers was emphatic and certainly never was success better deserved. Mr. Friedberg can return here whenever he desires and he will always be sure hereafter of a large clientele. The recital was under the local management of F. Wight Neumann.

Theodore Spiering in Chicago.

Among the visitors to this office this week was Theodore Spiering, the American conductor and violinist. Mr. Spiering's sojourn in Chicago on this occasion was of short duration, passing through on his way to New York from St. Louis, where he appeared with the orchestra last week, scoring a huge success. Mr. Spiering made his home in Chicago some years ago, and he counts here many friends who would be very glad to hear him either in recital or concert, and it is to be hoped that before long both his friends and innumerable admirers will be given opportunity to hear him after such a long absence spent for the most part in the East and in Europe, where, as readers of the Musical Courier know, he scored brilliant successes as conductor of different orchestras and is remembered in Chicago as the man who succeeded Gustav Mahler as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

MacBurney Studios Recital.

Ethel Geistweit Benedict, dramatic soprano, gave the sixth program in the MacBurney artist series at Hamilton Park, on December 7. Mrs. Benedict sang a MacDowell cycle, a group of Schumann songs, one of American songs and the aria "Ozean, du Ungeheuer," from Weber's opera, "Oberon." Mrs. Benedict has a voice of unusual range and quality, coupled with deep musical feeling. She has her resources so well in hand that she can command any nuance from the most delicate pianissimo to a full ringing forte. Her dramatic intensity and tonal color in the Schumann songs and the aria were particularly fine. The audience, which was a large one for a stormy night, was very enthusiastic.

Campanini Compliments Herman Devries.

Cleofonte Campanini, general director of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, surprised the Herman Devies opera class on Saturday last by an unexpected visit to the Devries studios. Two acts of "Don Giovanni" and one of "Lakme" were being rehearsed by principals and chorus, and the maestro soon was an eager and interested listener. At the conclusion of the rehearsal at 12 o'clock Mr. Campanini addressed the class in praise of their teacher and their work, which brought them to their feet, and the maestro received an ovation in the way of loud applause and cheers. Before leaving the studio Mr. Campanini bestowed especial congratulations upon the work of Mrs. Thomas J. Prindiville (the Lakme), Marie Yahr (Mallika), Lemuel Kilby (Don Giovanni), Florian Varkony (Leporello), Frederick T. Blum (Masetto), Ethel Magie (Donna Elvira) and Mrs. George Hixon (Zerlina). Marie Yahr sang also in a delightful manner the aria of Fides from "Le Prophete."

Apollo Club Postpones "Messiah" Performance.

The performance of Handel's "Messiah" by the Apollo Musical Club announced for Christmas night, December 25, has been changed to Monday night, December 28, at 8.15. Tickets dated Friday, December 25, will be honored on Monday, December 28, or they may be changed for other reserved seat tickets for Sunday afternoon, December 27. The Sunday afternoon performance on December 27 at 3.30 stands as originally scheduled. Preparations are being made to make this year's "Messiah" concerts by a chorus of 1,000 singers, the greatest in the history of Chicago and the West, since no expense is being spared to have everything the best, including the solo artists engaged. The entire Chicago Symphony Orchestra will furnish the orchestral accompaniments at both performances.

Spry-Kortschak-Steindel Trio in Recital.

On Sunday afternoon the Spry-Kortschak-Steindel Trio gave a recital at the Fine Arts Theatre. The program, though short, was interesting, and the combined work of the three artists was very proficient. The Beethoven trio, op. 70, No. 1, opened the program. Following this was a group of songs by Mrs. Clarence Eddy, the assisting soloist. Mrs. Eddy possesses an excellent contralto voice. Among her numbers was a new song by Lilla Ormond, "Roses are the Rhymes I Wreathe." Clarence Eddy was the accompanist for Mrs. Eddy. The trio in D minor of Schumann closed the program.

At the Blackstone Theatre.

A pleasing concert on Sunday afternoon was that of the Columbia School of Music, given at the Blackstone Theatre, presenting the school orchestra. The orchestra, under the direction of Ludwig Becker, played well, and no department of the organization is lacking in any respect. The "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert, the "Prize Song" of Wagner, Gliere's adagio and the closing waltz were all played in a manner most pleasing. The audience was justly appreciative. The soloists of the afternoon were Parthenia Carmichael, pianist; Malvinia Nielsson, violiniste, and Ernest J. Davis, tenor, all of whom showed excellent training. Miss Nielsson played Mozart's concerto in E flat with feeling, her technic being especially commendable.

First Concert of Madrigal Club.

The Chicago Madrigal Club, under the direction of D. A. Clippinger, gave its first concert of the season Monday evening, at the Germania Theatre. The program consisted of both sacred and secular numbers, the former showing better detail work than the latter, wherein the chorus seemed unable to sing as a body. The male portion of the club was very adequate, but the sopranos and contralto were weak, while there were one or two voices of unpleasant quality which could be heard above the others, to the detriment of the evening's enjoyment. Many of the sclections were enthusiastically received and were repeated. Assisting on the program was Leon Marx, violinist, whose rendition of Mendelssohn's concerto, De-

EFREM ZIMBALIST IN EVANSTON.

Last Tuesday morning, December 15, at the Evanston Woman's Club, under the management of Rachel Busey-Kinsolving, the third recital of the Tuesday morning musicales was given by Efrem Zimbalist, who played a well balanced program, suited to please the elite which filled the hall.

VAN VLIET IN CHICAGO.

Cornelius Van Vliet, the Dutch cellist, called at this office on his way back from Cincinnati, where he appeared with great success at the Matinee Musicale Club last Tuesday, December 15. Mr. Van Vliet is to appear as soloist, on December 17, in Minneapolis, with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, of which he has been the principal of the cello department for the past few years.

CHICAGO MENDELSSOHN CONCERT.

The first concert of the twenty-first season of the Chicago Mendelssohn Club was listened to by a large and enthusiastic audience at Orchestra Hall on Thursday evening, December 17. Harrison M. Wild, conductor of the club, had arranged an especially attractive and interesting program, which included several novelties. The soloist of the night was Albert Lindquest, tenor, who was heard in two groups of songs and in the solo of the "Leap of Roushan Beg," by Horatio Parker. Mr. Lindquest was in splendid voice and sang exquisitely two songs by Wolf-Ferrari and a group by Brahms. Mr. Lindquest has a lyric tenor voice, which he used with consummate artistry. He sang with great taste and musicianship and scored heavily with his hearers.

The Mendelssohn Club, one of the best male choruses in the land, has been well drilled and the different numbers consisting of the Bacchanalian Chorus, by J. W. Elliot, songs by Victor Herbert, Arthur Foote, Frederick F. Bullard, Homer B. Hatch, Gounod, Bridge, Bantock, Protheroe, Woodman, Wilson and Hammond, were rendered with that degree of finish expected from this splendid body of singers, whose work, praiseworthy in every respect, reflected credit on its leader. Mr. Wild may well be proud of the big success achieved by his forces.

THEODORA STURKOW RYDER'S CLASSICAL PROGRAMS.

Theodora Sturkow Ryder announces the second of the five classical programs in the Sturkow-Ryder Studios for Saturday afternoon, December 26. The program will consist of compositions by Mozart, Chopin and Sinding and Mme. Sturkow-Ryder will play with Jessie DeVore, the Beethoven sonata in A major for violin and piano.

MYRTLE IRENE MITCHELL IN CHICAGO.

Myrtle Irene Mitchell called at this office last week on her way from Kansas City to New York, where she will probably spend the holidays. Miss Mitchell, who has just presented to the Kansas City music lovers Marcella Craft in joint recital with Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, informed this department that her patrons told her that this was the best concert ever given under Miss Mitchell's management. Miss Mitchell was most enthusiastic about Miss Craft, who, she said, ranks with the greatest artists she has ever had under her local management, and added that she is a most interesting singer and quite out of the ordinary. Those glowing remarks coming from Miss Mitchell, who has managed in Kansas City such artists as Farrar, Sembrich and Garden among the songstresses, speaks well for Miss Craft. Miss Mitchell looked the picture of health and as ever brought to Chicago the latest word in fashion. Her next concert will take John McCormack to Kansas City on January 23.

PITTSBURGH CALLS FOR MRS. GANNON.

Rose Lutiger Gannon, contralto, has received a call from the Mozart Club, of Pittsburgh, to sing the contralto role in "The Messiah." She sang in this oratorio with the Flint Choral Union on December 15. Mrs. Gannon has been in great demand this season and has secured many dates for the months of January, February and March.

NOTES.

Grace Stewart Potter, a young Chicago pianist, who recently returned from Europe from her studies with Leschetizky and Busoni, will give a piano recital at the Illinois Theatre, Sunday afternoon, January 3, under the direction of F. Wight Neumann. Miss Potter is an exceptionally gifted artist. The recital is given under the patronage of Mrs. George M. Pullman.

The First Methodist Episcopal Church, of Oak Park, announces a Christmas music service for Sunday, December 20. The choir is made up of Adelaide Brown Tenney, soprano; Annabelle M. Dickey, contralto; George Lee Tenney, tenor; Frank Hayes Collins, baritone, and Ruth Simmons, organist.

At the Chicago Chamber Music Society's first concert of the present season given in the Foyer of Orchestra Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 17, by the Chicago String Quartet, the works presented consisted of the Beethoven quartet, op. 18, No. 6, and the same composer's quartet, op. 50, No. 1.

Theodora Sturkow Ryder sent her greetings to this office from Syracuse, N. Y., stating that she is enjoying her trip and recitals.

Invitations were issued by the Sherwood Music School for a two piano recital, given by Georgia Kober and members of the piano faculty of the school in the Thurber Recital Hall, on Thursday evening, December 17.

The sixth concert of the third season of the Sinai Orchestra, given Sunday evening, December 20, included beside the orchestral numbers under the direction of Arthur Dunham, an organ solo played by Mr. Dunham and a group of numbers given by the Glee Club of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

People's Symphony Concert.

Franz X. Arens, who conducted the first People's Symphony concert of this season in Carnegie Hall, New York, December 20, must have been pleased with the excellent playing of his men, who undoubtedly constitute the best orchestra he has yet had, with Maurice Kaufmann as concertmaster. The "Freischütz" overture had much swing, with clean-cut periods, and the "Pathetic" symphony of Tschaikowsky was done in altogether superior fashion, especially considering the few rehearsals—said to have been three. Applause was such that the conductor bade his men rise twice in acknowledgment during the playing of the symphony.

The solo cooperation of Maud Powell, in Beethoven's violin concerto, added dignity to the affair, and took at least one listener back a few years, when, following her playing of a David piece by the young student, Maud Powell, at Leipsic, one auditor said, "That young girl is a genius." "Tut, tut," said another, "she's only a hard worker." The world has since found that Maud Powell is both a genius and a hard worker, winning laurels for American womanhood as she travels through the land. Of her dignified, really classic playing of the Beethoven concerto, with its immensely difficult cadenza, and later, in Saint-Saëns' "Rondo Capriccioso," it need only be said it was beautiful, bringing her such long continued applause, that she had to add a Fiorillo study, unaccompanied, and still another. A large audience attended, and listened with that eagerness characteristic of the audiences of all the People's Symphony concerts and its affiliated institution, the People's Chamber Music Concerts.

Reception at David Studios.

Mr. and Mrs. Ross David gave the first of a series of reception musicales on Saturday evening, December 12, in their spacious residence-studios at 49 West Eighty-fifth street, New York. About fifty guests were seated in a large room opening into an attractive hall, where the artists stood. The background was of laurel and many candles cast a flickering light, giving the whole scene a festive appearance. Pupils of Mr. David, the New York vocal teacher, gave a varied and interesting program, displaying the excellent training they have received from their able instructor. These pupils were Mrs. George Dalzell, soprano; Otto Roehling, baritone, and Harmonie David, soprano. They were ably assisted by Marion David, who acted as pianist and accompanist, and whose sympathetic work greatly enhanced the enjoyment of the evening.

A general reception followed the musicale, which was also enjoyed greatly by the musicians and music lovers who were present.

Columbia Chorus Sings "Messiah."

On Saturday evening, December 19, the Columbia University Chorus gave an excellent performance of Handel's "Messiah" in the gymnasium of the university, New York City, the soloists being Agnes Alsop Ward, soprano; Ida Gardner, contralto; Dan Beddoe, tenor; and Robert Maitland, bass. The spacious room was crowded nearly to its capacity by an audience of music lovers who showed by spontaneous and prolonged applause their appreciation of the rendering given this oratorio under the efficient direction of Prof. Walter Henry Hall.

The work of the chorus of more than two hundred voices reflected great credit upon its leader. A well defined tonal balance was maintained throughout the work, while the exquisite shading and pianissimo effects which Prof. Hall everywhere brought out were especially noticeable in the chorus, "For Unto Us a Child is Born."

The University Chorus which is now in its fourth season, is rapidly winning a prominent place for itself among the first choral societies of New York. An assisting orchestra with F. Lorenz Smith as concertmaster lent excellent aid with the exception of the final choruses when the brasses overshadowed the voices to such an extent that it was difficult to distinguish the latter.

Of the soloists upon this occasion it may be said that they were in all respects excellent. Mrs. Ward proved herself to be the possessor of a soprano of good quality which she uses effectively. Miss Gardner, a newcomer to New York recently arrived from Paris, has a contralto of soft and pleasing color and is inspired by a very genuine musicianship.

Regarding the work of Dan Beddoe, the tenor soloist, there is no comment necessary for he may always be relied upon to give of his best, and his best means fine interpretative work and faultless vocal execution. In an oratorio like "The Messiah," where the tenor voice occupies a comparatively unimportant part, his two arias stood out the more strongly, testifying to his thorough musicianship.

Robert Maitland, the bass, has made an excellent impression during the short time he has been in America, and his work on this occasion served to strengthen this impression. His final aria especially "Why do the nations?" was given in a clear ringing voice, creating a telling effect throughout the crowded room.

Prof. Hall is to be congratulated for this, another triumph to his credit, for his inspiring leadership is due the success of this evening and of the chorus itself as well. Under his direction the University chorus will unite with the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, which is now in its twentieth season, in presenting Edward Elgar's "Music Makers" and Hamilton Harty's "Mystic Trumpeter" at Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening, of February 2, 1915. They will be assisted by Mildred Potter, contralto, and Clarence Whitehill, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and an orchestra of sixty men.

Rubinstein Club Musicale.

A clever idea was that of Miss Pelton-Jones, viz., the originating of "An Afternoon with Marie Antoinette at Versailles," for the second musicale of the Rubinstein Club, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York, Saturday afternoon, December 19. Mrs. William Rogers Chapman, president, and officers of the club, sat on raised seats, the president on a veritable throne, at the left of the classic-appearing stage, whence they greeted the artists of the afternoon. These were: Frances Pelton-Jones, the author of the entertainment, harpsichordist and pianist; Florence de Courcy, contralto; William Wheeler, tenor, and William M. Kincaid, flutist. The appropriate gowns worn by the "court" and the artists, with white wigs and various fixings which a mere man cannot name, but which look altogeher charming, made it a pretty scene.

Miss Pelton-Jones played a group of pieces by Loeilly, Handel, an dthe Paderewski "Menuet," the latter in her own arrangement, all on the harpsichord, with really delicious effect, and later the andante and finale of the overture to "William Tell" (again her own arrangement), the last-named on the modern grand piano, and with scintillating brilliancy. She played all the accompaniments, showing herself to be the skilful, sympathetic pianist and good musician.

Mme. deCourcy's voice is of beautiful quality, is used with consummate skill and taste, and she pleased everyone. Her last duet, "The Keys of Heaven," sung with Mr. Wheeler, was altogether graceful and unique, both artists singing and acting their parts with archness and telling effect.

Mr. Wheeler was especially pleasing in a group of old Scotch and Irish songs, "MacGregor's Gathering" having dramatic impulse, everything being sung with ease and enjoyable tone-production.

Mr. Kincaid showed himself a skilful flutist.

A Mozart menuet was danced, in costume, by the following, relatives of members of the club: Annette Taussig, Winifred Goldsmith, Elsie Marsh, Henrietta MacElhinney, Dorothy MacRae, Helen MacRea, Josepha MacRae, Helen Schreiber, Harrison Cleveland, Elliott Downes, Norman O'Connell, Herbert Rau, Norton Ritchie, Douglas Storer, Walter Stewart, Russel Tower.

Alice Garrigue Mott's Studio Notes.

Owing to the numerous daily lessons and rehearsals of programs for professional singers and actresses, Mme. Mott is unable to try any more voices until next month.

Among her pupils, Dorothy Ball has been engaged for concerts to be given in Brooklyn, Perth Amboy and Minersville, Pa. Mrs. Roy Lerch has been engaged for the next symphony concert, at Easton, Pa. Marie Kaiser was a soloist at the Orpheus Club, Paterson, December 8.

The Paterson Morning Call states "Miss Kaiser's singing of the difficult recitative and aria from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" made the audience rave over her. The volume of tone and its quality electrified the audience, especially when Miss Kaiser surprised her listeners with her exquisite trill."

Mrs. Ganz Due Thursday.

Mrs. Rudolph Ganz, the wife of Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, is expected to arrive with her son, Roy, on the steamship Carpathia, about December 24. Mr. and Mrs. Ganz and their son will make their home in New York during the season.

BOSTON'S TONAL DOINGS OF FIRST PERIOD OF SEASON REVIEWED.

Musical Courier Representative Discusses Present Situation in the Hub—Three Attractions Per Diem the Average—Liszt's "Faust" to Be Performed in Concert Form—General Current News.

11 Boylston Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., December 18, 1914.

The approaching holidays have caused a decrease in local concert activities, the present week showing a decided curtailment in such affairs. As the coming week will mark the end of the first period of Boston's concert season the present writing might serve as an opportune time to indulge in a brief review of general happenings and conditions as they have impressed the Boston representative of the MUSICAL COURIER.

In the first place, Boston's musical public has been overfed with concerts. This statement is not meant to imply a superabundance of first class attractions, but rather a conglomeration of musical events in which the public at large was unable at all times to judge beforehand as to where merit was, or was not to be found. The fallacy of these conditions was most apparent in the sizes of attending audiences, for quite often artists of real merit drew meager attendances while those of less ability succeeded in attracting capacity houses. Our concert schedule has maintained an average of three attractions a day. The symphony concerts have suffered a slight falling off in attendance, when one compares this year's subscription sale to those of former years; the difference is, however, scarcely noticeable. The Cambridge series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains as popular as ever, and with the new John Knowles-Paine Concert Hall at Harvard University, Cambridge is now a very important center in the music of this locality.

The failure of the recent Italian opera venture which started out so successfully at the old Boston Theatre, and would still have been under way, if its fate had depended on real operatic merit, is now past history, a history for which Boston can coin no plausible excuse. Of achievements successfully accomplished, the Boston Music School Settlement series of concerts for the people can be given prominent mention. This series of five concerts is now completed and it is sincerely hoped that the committee in charge will continue its good work next year.

In the teaching world conditions have been very favorable. Our foremost studios have large waiting lists and a constant influx of new students is still noticeable.

GABRILOWITSCH JOINT RECITAL.

On Saturday afternoon, December 12, Mr. and Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch gave a joint concert in Jordan Hall. Mr. Gabrilowitsch played the following piano pieces: Schumann sonata in G minor; Beethoven sonata, op, 81; Chopin, twelve preludes, op. 28. Mrs. Gabrilowitsch sang as her share of the program the following selections: Schubert's "Allmacht," "Eine Muehle" and "Am Grabe Anselmo's; Schumann's "In's Freie"; Brahms' "Four Gypsy Songs"; Duparc's "Extase;" Debussy's "Mandolin," and Faure's "Toujours." Mr. Gabrilowitsch is well remembered for fine performances here in the past, and his return after several years absence aroused much interest. Critics were lavish in their praise of his masterful playing and noted the splendid growth in the pianist's artistry. The Russian pianist was in ideal form and his performance was one long to be remembered. According to report, Mrs. Gabrilowitsch has not been heard in this city since 1907. At that time she sang as Clara Clemens and attracted especial attention as the daughter of Mark Twain. Mrs. Gabrilowitsch is a finely developed artist and her work on this afternoon pleased immensely.

CROWDS HEAR KREISLER.

When Fritz Kreisler made his entry on the Symphony Hall stage last Sunday afternoon, he was given the same reception on the whole as that which was accorded him on the previous afternoon at Carnegie Hall in New York. The great audience filled every available inch of space in Symphony Hall, and in fact another great audience had been turned away from the doors unable to secure tickets for this, Kreisler's first appearance in Boston since his return from Europe. The program was the same as that used at his New York recital.

A PROGRAM OF BEACH COMPOSITIONS.

The second concert of the week occurred on Wednesday afternoon, December 16, when Mrs. H. H. A. Beach gave a program of her own compositions at Steinert Hall. She was assisted by Karola Frick, soprano, and the Hoffmann Quartet. As Mrs. Beach is one of the most prominent women in the musical world, and as she is especially well known in Boston, a large audience attended her concert. The compositions offered on this program represented a wide diversity of style and gave splendid opportunity to study the remarkable talent of this American composer. The two piano numbers played by Mrs. Beach, a prelude and fugue and a valse fantasie, were heard for the first time. These numbers are still in manuscript. Both works are characteristic of the composer's effective style and would prove valuable additions to any pianist's repertoire.

Two groups of songs were given, the first in German comprised "Ein altes Gebet," "Grossmüterchen," "Der Totenkranz" and "Deine Blumen," the second group contained "O Sweet Content," "The Lotos Isles," "Separation" and "Elle et Moi." These songs all contain good material and they were sung in fitting style by the talented soprano, Mme. Frick. The quintet, op. 67, was read by the Hoffmann Quartet and Mrs. Beach and proved to be one of the most interesting features of the program.

The composer was tendered a flattering reception and received many beautiful floral tributes. Her works were heard with pleasure and succeeded in bringing forth many words of praise from the local critics.

BELGIAN RELIEF CONCERT.

On Thursday evening at Steinert Hall an entertainment in aid of the Belgian relief cause was given. Amy Lowell and Josephine Peabody, two of America's well known poetesses, read from some of their more recent works. Hans Ebell, the Russian pianist, assisted in the program. His numbers were Liszt's "Funerailles:" a nocturne and mazurka by Chopin; "Chant d'Automne" by Tschaikowsky and the Rachmaninoff prelude in G minor. Ebell's remarkable virtuousity continues to surprise Boston audiences. His playing on this evening was even more effective than it has been at any of his previous appearances in this city.

IRMA SEYDEL RETURNS.

Irma Seydel, the young violinist has returned to Boston somewhat earlier than originally planned. As announced some weeks ago in the Boston letter, Miss Seydel contemplated remaining in Germany to fulfill engagements which would have kept her in that country until the latter part of December and then to sail immediately to America arriving here in time for her tour which begins early in January. Conditions abroad brought about the cancellation of some of her engagements and in view of the uncertainty of other engagements, the young artist thought it best to return at once to this country. Miss Seydel was a fellow passenger with Fritz Kreisler on the steamer Rotterdam which arrived in New York on November 24. She also had the honor of having Mr. Keisler for her accompanist at a concert given aboard ship on the evening preceding their arrival in New York. It was interesting to hear that the famous Austrian violinist played all the piano parts without music.

Miss Seydel was received with much enthusiasm throughout her German concert tour. She played with several of the foremost orchestras of that country and during the past two months performed on various occasions for the wounded soldiers at different hospital stations. Miss Seydel remarks that such appearances gave her unlimited reward, and deepest of all her regret at present seems to lie in the fact that she is unable to pass among the wounded of her country and minister to them through the medium of her chosen instrument and art. An extensive tour has been arranged for this country which will start early in January. Miss Seydel will be heard in the most of the largest American cities, appearing in recital, concert and as soloist with several leading orchestras.

DR. MUCK TO PRESENT "FAUST."

With the cooperation of the Apollo Club of this city, Dr. Karl Muck is now enabled to fufill his plan of a performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which will be heard at the first pair of Boston Symphony concerts in the new year or on January 1 and 2. Paul Draper has been engaged as tenor soloist and the choir from the Apollo Club will sing the chorus for men's voices with which the symphony ends.

NOTES.

Horatio Parker's new choral poem which was written for production here in April at the centenary festival of the Handel and Haydn Society will be published by Schirmer. It is called "Morven and the Grail," and Brian Hooker, who collaborated with Mr. Parker in the music drama "Mona," wrote the text from the Arthurian legend.

Fritz Kreisler returns to Symphony Hall for a second recital on Sunday afternoon, January 10.

Mme. Schumann-Heink will give her annual song recital in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon. December 27.

George Copeland, the pianist who taught Bostonians to appreciate Debussy, will give a piano recital in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, January 7.

VICTOR WINTON.

Huss to Appear at the M. T. N. A.

Henry Holden Huss has been invited to read a paper on "The New Era in Piano Study" at the piano conference, Tuesday afternoon, December 29, at the Music Teachers' National Association, to be held in Pittsburgh. On that afternoon he will also play a group of six of his piano compositions, viz., "Etude Romantique," op. 23 (dedicated to Paderewski); prelude in D, op. 17; "Intermezzo" in G (Brahmsianer), op. 23 (dedicated to Joseffy); "Valse" in A, op. 20; nocturne, op. 20; prelude in A flat, op. 17.

Blanche Manley, Lyric Soprano.

Blanche Manley is one of those born singers who cannot remember the time when she did not sing. During her school years she was continually called upon to appear at various musical festivities, and always with absolute success.

Mme. Gadski, who heard Miss Manley sing several years ago, has taken particular interest in the young soprano.

Later Miss Manley went to Florence, Italy, where she studied for two years with the maestro, Vicenzo Lombardi, who pronounced her voice to be of exceptional quality, and predicted a brilliant future for her.

While she was studying with Lombardi, Henry Russell, manager of the Boston Opera Company, heard Miss Manley sing and immediately engaged her for a term of two years. Last year she was engaged to appear in leading roles with Oscar Hammerstein, but, owing to the fact that his operatic project was abandoned, the New York public was temporarily denied the privilege of hearing this talented soprano in opera.

Miss Manley has of late devoted her art to the concert stage, where she has been well received.

Dunning Musical Talk at Waldorf-Astoria.

Carrie Louise Dunning, the originator of the Dunning System of Improved Music Study for Beginners, gave one of her interesting illustrative musical talks at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel (Myrtle Room), New York, last Friday morning, December 18. She was assisted by Mrs. Armstrong, of Texas, a teacher-pupil.

Mrs. Dunning, believing that much of the drudgery of piano teaching and piano learning can be lightened, has evolved this system, whereby through musical games, thoroughly artistic in nature, the pupils become so interested that they learn "in spite of themselves." Its worth is tested by the splendid results attained by Mrs. Dunning, and its growth has become so widespread that Mrs. Dunning devotes the greater part of her time at present to teaching teachers and giving these demonstrations for the benefit of parents and friends of the pupils. Each season she conducts large classes in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chicago, Seattle and other cities of the Far West.

Her system has been endorsed by Theodor Leschetizky, Xaver Scharwenka, Vladimir de Pachmann, Ferruccio Busoni, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Wager Swayne, William Sherwood, Henry Holden Huss, Victor Herbert, Dr. William Mason, Dr. William C. Carl, Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler, Johanna Gadski and Teresa Carreño.

The following are patronesses: Mrs. Henry Phipps, Mrs. Bradley Martin, Mrs. C. H. Gould, Mrs. S. B. Chapin, Emma Thursby, Mrs. Murray Whiting Ferris and Mrs. John Hay Hammond.

Alberta Carina's Concert Success.

Alberta Carina, leading coloratura soprano of the Komische Oper, Berlin, and of the Municipal Opera Elberfeld, not only earned laurels on these stages, but was equally applauded on the concert platform. She appeared first in France. In Paris she sang in many of the best musical salons. Later, she appeared in Belgium, Holland and Germany winning everywhere great praise for her artistic work.

Miss Carina's marked personality, her deep musical and poetic feeling, as well as her interpretative ability, make her a lieder singer of renowned and rare qualities and enabled her to create a field all her own in Europe. She will begin her American concert tournee in January and has already many dates booked in the Eastern States.

"Don Pasquale" Performed in Cincinnati.

Cincinnati, Ohio, December 16, 1914.

"Don Pasquale" was the opera selected for presentation by the Springer Opera Club of the College of Music this year, and Tuesday night it was given in all its vivacity and tunefulness under the able direction of Romeo Gorno.

The usual large and enthusiastic audience filled the Odeon, and gave the young opera aspirants a generous meed of applause. The Springer Opera Club has won some splendid successes in the past, but Tuesday night's performance went with a swing and abandon, a joyfulness that made "Don Pasquale" the climax of the club's efforts.

Anna von Unruh, whose clear, fresh soprano and charming stage presence made her an adorable Norina, sang this role, which was a favorite with Adelina Patti, in a sprightly manner. Walter Vaughn, as Ernst, had an opportunity to show the timbre and quality of his fine tenor in the serenade, "Come Gentile." Mr. Vaughn is preparing for a professional career and is much in demand at local concerts. Paul Sebring, baritone, who scored a success last year in "Tales of Hoffmann," had the comic role of Don Pasquale and gave it a creditable interpretation. The wily Dr. Malatesta was impersonated by Daniel Burke. Among those having minor parts, but whose fresh, well trained voices and good acting added materially to the success of the opera were: Wm. Kerr, Ethel Griffith, Grace Sensing, and Wm. Meinders.

The credit of the finished performance belongs to Sig. Romeo Gorno who has worked indefatigably for the success of the opera. Sig. Gorno, despite the fact that he has a very large piano class, gave all of his spare time to training and coaching the singers, even foregoing some concert appearance on his own behalf, so engrossed was he with "Don Pasquale." In his labors he had the assistance of Joseph O'Meara, who, as stage manager, played a notable part in producing a correct stage picture. That musical Cincinnati appreciated the well mounted and beautifully sung opera was quite evident in the prolonged applause and the congratulations extended to director and performers at its close. JESSIE PARTLON TYREE.

Virgil Piano Conservatory Recital.

The last piano recital given by the Virgil Piano Conservatory, New York, for the year 1914 occurred on Friday, December 18. It was a notable affair and will long be remembered on account of the excellent playing by several of the performers. The program was rather long, but was exceptionally well rendered.

Modena Scovill played the twelfth rhapsodie, by Liszt, particularly well, both as to interpretation and execution. In the big polonaise in E major, by the same composer, she showed accuracy, authority and effective tonal contrasts.

Emma Lipp delighted the audience with her rendition of the Tausig arrangement of "Man lebt nur einmal," a brilliant and difficult composition, requiring a skillful mastery of the keys, as well as a keen sense of rhythm, and the effect and exhilaration of the waltz movement united to the intuitive tone shadings demanded.

Bertha Henry played the beautiful "Liebes Walzer," by Moszkowski, with charming effect. She possesses a fine and brilliant execution and both breadth and delicacy of tone.

Marion Blair deserves special mention for her playing of the "Black Key Etude," by Chopin, which was surprisingly effective for a player of her years—velocity apparently has no terrors for her.

Charles Jagels is an exceptionally attractive young player; he contributed "To a Humming Bird," by Mrs. A. M. Virgil, in which he demonstrated his accuracy and clearness of execution and velocity, together with a nice appreciation of tone; also the "Cradle Song," of Barilli, which was given with soft, beautiful tones that were highly effective.

Katherine Sidebotham received special commendation for her rendition of the well known "Staccato Caprice," by Vogrich, which demands technic of a high order and fine mental control.

Fabri Collegium Salon.

The Fabri Collegium gave its first concert on Friday evening, December 18, before a large and fashionable audience. Those who participated were G. Aldo Randegger (head of the piano department), and the following pupils of the Collegium: Helen Blase, soprano; Jane E' Del, mezzo-soprano; Robert Wyatt, tenor, and Signor Salvatori Cibelli, tenor. The latter, possessing an exceptional voice, was the winner of a scholarship at this institution.

Shattuck Returns to America.

Arthur Shattuck arrived in New York on the steamer Baltic, of the White Star line, from Liverpool on Saturday, December 19, and left two days later for his home in Wisconsin.

Since the beginning of the war Mr. Shattuck has spent most of his time in England. He returned to Paris about six weeks ago, remaining there a week, "just to look things over," and reports that conditions there are pitiful. While there he was requested by Mme. Lamoureux to be soloist at one of a series of monster concerts to be given at the Trocadero. It was found, however, that these concerts would not be permitted, music being tabood during these tragic times in France.

While in England Mr. Shattuck played a number of orchestral engagements in the provinces, notably at Bournemouth, at Harrogate, where a special concert of British music was given, and at Brighton, whose orchestra is deservedly famous. At these concerts Mr. Shattuck used a concerto composed by Boyle. He reports that these concerts were well attended and that through the whole performance every hand was busy knitting. He will use the Boyle concerto in America. He starts his tour of this country on New Year's Day and will play many recitals and a number of orchestral engagements, among them Minneapolis, Chicago, Detroit, Grand Rapids, with the Cincinnati Orchestra, etc.

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Gilberté Songs at Mrs. Henry Smock Boice's Studio—Heinrich Meyn at Stransky At-Home—Hamish Mackay and the "Diel"—Noble's Christmas Organ Recital Program—Tollefsen Trio in Two Appearances—Tonkünstler Society Meeting—Recital at Elizabeth Kelso Patterson Home—Royal Dadmun in Albany and Pittsburgh—Elizabeth Topping Notices—Gally, a Nichols' Pupil—Lenox Academy of Music Concerts—Sorrentino Returns—Notes.

A program of Gilberté songs was given at the attractive studios of Mrs. Henry Smock Boice, 43 East Twenty-seventh street, Wednesday evening, December 16. Because of the thoroughly musical and melodious quality of the songs presented, and the artistry and good voices of the singers, the program proved thoroughly enjoyable.

Mr. Gilberté, who was the accompanist of the evening, is already numbered among the young American composers of note and his versatility was well demonstrated by the songs of the evening—songs for coloratura soprano, interpreted on this occasion by Florence Anderson Otis, already well known, because of her beautifully trained and true coloratura voice of lovely timbre, and because of her artistic work. Mrs. Otis added "A Maiden's Yea and Nay" as an encore; songs for lyric soprano, to which Katherine Bickford-Self gave charming interpretation. Though a pupil at the Boice studios only a short time, Mrs. Self already shows evidence of the method, in her smooth, easy emission and untampered clear diction; songs for contralto, but only one number was given, however, as Jessie Rowe-Lockitt programmed for three was suffering from a severe cold. She was notwithstanding heard with excellent effect in this "An Evening Song;" for mezzo-soprano, sung by Grace Douglass Beel; for tenor, by William J. R. Thiers, and for baritone, by Wilmar Bradshaw.

The work was uniformly excellent, showing what good voices expertly trained can accomplish.

Among those present were the American composers, Carrie Jacobs Bond and John Prindle Scott.

Heinrich Meyn at Stransky At-Home.

After the Philharmonic concerts, Mr. and Mrs. Josef Stransky are always at home to their friends. At these affairs music plays an important part. At a recent reception of this sort, Heinrich Meyn sang three songs by Brahms, two by Strauss, and four French songs.

Mr. Meyn's protege, Marco Teyrot, the young Belgian cellist, played several selections. Among the guests were Mischa Elman, Mr. and Mrs. Leo Schultz, Mr. and Mrs. George Hamlin, Mrs. Frank King-Clark, Jeannette Spencer and Emma Juch-Wellman.

Hamish Mackay and "The Diel."

Hamish Mackay, the Highland baritone, and his bonnie Scottish friends must have had the "Diel" of a time at the Amsterdam Opera House, December 15. On the program were several bagpipe selections, one "The Diel in the Kitchen," a song by Moffatt entitled, "The Diel's awa wi' the Excisemen" and various others suggesting his Satanic Majesty. Mr. Mackay sang little known Scottish songs, and the New York Scottish Highlanders pipe and drum band played. There were bagpipe selections, an exhibition of Highland dancing, and folkdances, all combining in a program of much variety. Fay Foster was at the piano. It is recalled that Andrew Carnegie, when asked "Why do bagpipers always walk when they play?" replied "Hoot mon! It's to git awa frae th' music."

Noble's Christmas Organ Recital.

Sunday evening, December 27, at eight o'clock, in St. Thomas' Church, 53d street and Fifth avenue, T. Tertius Noble, the organist, will play the following program, especially chosen for the Christmas season:

Pastorale from Christmas Oratorio	Bach
Offertoire on Two Christmas Themes	Guilmant
Pastorale in F	Kullak
Evening Song	Bairstow
Elegy	Noble
Solemn Prelude	Noble
Sonata No. 1 in D minor	Guilmant

December 20, Mr. Noble journeyed to Toronto, Canada, where he played on a four manual Gassavant organ. January 1 he gives a recital in a large private house at Rosemont, Pa., on a beautiful organ built by the Aeolian Company.

Tollefsen Trio Concerts.

The Tollefsen Trio, assisted by Ashley Ropps, baritone, gave a concert under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Friday, December 11. The Trio's principal number was Cadman's new trio, op. 56, in D major, performed in Brooklyn for the first time. This work was introduced in Manhattan last March at a Mozart Society concert, and a Manuscript Society concert, with the composer at the piano. At its first Brooklyn performance it was exceptionally well liked, being the feature of the evening. The three members of the Trio all had to give encores following their solos, and there was a good sized audience. Brooklyn papers devoted considerable space, with pictures, giving special attention to the Cadman trio.

At the Commercial High School, Brooklyn, December 6, Cornelius Rübner's andante expressivo, from op. 9, and the well known "Dumky" trio, of Dvorak, with solo numbers, were performed by this Trio and its individual members.

Tonkünstler Society Meeting.

The Tonkünstler Society held a meeting December 8, at Memorial Hall, Brooklyn, and found a good sized audience in attendance despite the stormy night. The audience was well repaid for the effort in listening to a program of exceptional interest. Ruth Taylor and Campbell Weston united in Handel's sonata in D major, played in brilliant style. Duos for two pianos by Rheinberger and Saint-Saëns were played by Walter Haan and Alexander Rihm, with excellent technical finish. Miss Taylor's violin selections pleased the audience. A suite for piano, violin and cello by Moussorgsky is an exquisite composition, full of contrasting harmonies and melodies. This suite was played by Campbell Weston (piano), Ruth Taylor (violin) and Gustav O. Hornberger (cello). The rich, appealing, mellow and contrasting tone of the cello, especially in the lento movement, was most beautiful. Mr. Hornberger made his instrument sing like a human voice, and the number, with its unusually beautiful cello part, was the climax of the evening.

Recital at Patterson Home.

At the home of Elizabeth Kelso Patterson, 257 West 104th street, December 10, Geraldine Holland collaborated with Emilie Grey, harpist in a program of alternate soprano and harp numbers. Mme. Grey, a well known English harpist, is a most capable artist, possessing a brilliant technic and beautiful tone. She played selections by Saint-Saëns, Gabriel Pierne, Zabel, Alvars, Aptomas, Margaret Hoberg, and Thomas. The circular issued by Mme. Grey quotes Landon Ronald, Wassily Safonoff, and Ivan Caryll in praise of her playing. Miss Holland's vocal numbers, as usual, were important and well sung.

Royal Dadmun in Albany and Pittsburgh.

Royal Dadmun, the baritone, has been singing in various cities, including Albany and Pittsburgh. He has also sung for universities and clubs, with several "Messiah" dates booked. He was soloist for the Mendelssohn Club of Albany, December 9, when the local press praised his singing highly. The Evening Journal said: "All that could be gained from delightful diction and lucid interpretation was shown by Mr. Dadmun's work in several numbers. His bass-baritone work is convincing, and he responded to two or three encores." The Knickerbocker Press said: "Mr. Dadmun's selections were happily chosen and served to display his mellow, vibrant tones to perfection."

He sang at a concert in the Twentieth Century Club of Pittsburgh, November 24, and the Pittsburgh Gazette Times said: "Excellent phrasing was a characteristic of Mr. Dadmun's performance, as well as admirable diction and intelligent interpretation."

Alfred E. Gally, a Nichols Pupil.

Alfred E. Gally, tenor, a promising pupil of John W. Nichols, has recently been chosen to complete the quartet at the Beck Memorial Church. His solos show the careful and thorough training he has received, and are a delight to his listeners. On the evening of December 20 he will be heard in Matthew's "The Story of Christmas."

Elizabeth Topping Notices.

Elizabeth Topping, concert pianist and teacher, taught at the Toronto Conservatory, at several leading ladies' schools of the United States, and has been for four years at Miss Porter's School, Farmington, Conn. She is a brilliant pianist and a superior teacher, and in these capacities has been very successful in the metropolis. Two press notices follow:

Miss Topping is an able pianist in every sense, as was noted in her interpretation of her selections. Her style is marked for its brilliance, and she has an elastic touch and perfect command of herself and of the instrument.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Miss Topping played with an almost masculine grasp of the music that made one wish to hear her with an orchestra.—Toronto Globe.

Lenox Academy of Music Concerts.

Wednesday evening, January 20, a concert will be given by the orchestra of the Lenox Academy of Music, H. H. Reppert, director, at the Central Opera House. Mr. Reppert will appear as violin soloist, accompanied by Elsie Lawson, who will also play a piano solo. February 17, the second concert under Mr. Reppert's direction will be given at Central Baptist Church.

Umberto Sorrentino Returns.

Following a stay of six months in Europe, principally in Italy, his native heath, Umberto Sorrentino, the tenor, returned to New York, December 16, on the steamer Re d'Italia. His friends and admirers, of whom there are many in America, extend from St. Louis to the coast, for he has appeared extensively as soloist in various concerts, with orchestra, etc.

Choral Art Concert.

Alfred Y. Cornell and the choral forces comprising the Choral Art Club, of Brooklyn (mixed voices), gave an enjoyable private concert in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, December 18, asisted by the Trio de Lutece, consisting of flute, harp and cello. Various Christmas-tide motets, folksongs, Noels, etc., were sung, unaccompanied, and with piano, showing the excellent control of the conductor. Beautiful numbers were the two "Negro Spirituals," arranged by Burleigh, and the two Russian compositions which closed the program, by Rubetz and Taneyef, were finely sung and much applauded. The trios by the instrumentalists were liked, and Sidney Dorlon Lowe's accompaniments received general recognition by those who understood his art. A festively attired audience, handsomely printed programs, and the good looking chorus all served to make the concert successful.

Notes.

The vesper services at St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, are largely musical. The organist is assisted by the following solo quartet: Grace Kerns, soprano; Mrs. Benedict-Jones, contralto; William Wheeler, tenor, and Frederick Welds, bass. Fifty well trained singers form the chorus. December 13, violin, harp and organ were used to assist in the service. An effective number was Verdi's "Pater Noster," sung a capella. Mr. Welds sang the bass solo from Verdi's "Requiem" very effectively; the contrasting tones of bass and organ were beautiful. Following the vesper services, an organ recital was given. The vesper music last Sunday consisted of excerpts from "The Messiah." On Christmas Day, the music will be the Christmas oratorio by Bach, and there will be an hour of Christmas carols, at four o'clock, December 27.

Edmund Jaques, organist and choirmaster at St. Paul's Chapel, Broadway and Fulton street, announces a Christmas carol service for Thursday, December 24, at twelve o'clock, noon. There will be no solos and no collection, simply general singing of Christmas carols. "Hark! The Herald Angels Sing" and the "Adeste Fideles" will be sung by the full choir on the church porch, at twelve, noon. Tuesday, December 29, at twelve o'clock, noon, "The Christ Child" cantata will be performed.

The Women's Philharmonic Society's second afternoon musicale, December 26, at the Granberry studios, Carnegie Hall, will consist of a lecture recital on the oratorios, "The Creation," "The Messiah," and "Elijah," by Lute deVore Conaly. Mme. Tetedoux-Lusk is chairman of the entertainment committee. January 23, at the third musicale, compositions by Frank Howard Warner will be performed. The women's orchestra, Madeleine Eddy, conductor, will give its first orchestral concert in January, date and place to be announced.

Samuel A. Baldwin's four hundredth organ recital at City College, December 13, brought compositions by Guilmant, Bossi, Bach, Lemare, Frysinger, Tschaikowsky, Schubert, and Wagner. A program note said:

In these recitals the Great Hall and its organ are dedicated to the service of the city.

Beginning with the opening of the organ on February 11, 1908, there have been 2,930 performances of 610 different works, embracing every school of organ composition as well as many transcriptions for the instrument. The total attendance has exceeded 500,000.

Marion Gregory, soprano, who is a most artistic singer, sings for her friends, Friday afternoons, from three to four o'clock, No. 2 Washington Square North. Miss Gregory's beautiful voice, refined interpretations, and sympathetic personality are well known to many New Yorkers.

Spiering's Rousing Welcome at St. Louis.

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra showed its wisdom in engaging Theodore Spiering for the concerts of December 11 and 12, in view of the cancellation of the date of Willy Burmester, who is war bound in Europe. The society also showed that it could do a graceful thing when occasion offers, as Mr. Spiering is a former St. Louisan. At the matinee, as well as at the concert, the large audiences by their presence paid honor to this distinguished musician and made their presence felt by their enthusiastic and warm tribute of welcome to one who recently returned to America after a series of brilliant European triumphs. In commenting upon Spiering's playing of the Bruch G minor concerto the St. Louis papers said:

"Mr. Spiering's welcome was warm, and his performance brought about a demonstration that must have pleased him mightily. Mr. Spiering's splendid musicianship stood him in good stead. . . . It was a musically firm and satisfying performance of the overplayed Bruch G minor concerto."—St. Louis Times, December 12, 1914.

"He is essentially a musical scholar and not a dreamer. He is a practical violinist, brought up in a classical school, devoted to the highest ideals, looking upon his art with reverence, and upon the practice of it as a great privilege. He plays accurately, enthusiastically, with a great variety of tone color and with enthusiasm. Mr. Spiering played the concerto with a clear tone, accurate intonation, decided rhythm and almost faultless interpretation. Six or eight recalls by a delighted audience indicated to some extent the pleasure he had afforded his listeners."—St. Louis Republic, December 12, 1914.

"A free, but studiously correct manner characterized his presentation. His tone was clear and even. The allegro was given beautifully. Spiering's best effort was in the adagio, in which he revealed his fine musicianly qualities to the utmost. Here he developed a wondrously full tone, sustained and singing. The house listened spellbound and broke forth in thunderous applause."—St. Louis Globe Democrat, December 12, 1914.

"His interpretation of the Bruch composition reached its highest point of excellence in the adagio, the exquisite singing quality of which was finely brought out, and . . . the complete performance of his task was scholarly and finished and left a satisfying impression on the minds of his hearers."—St. Louis Post Dispatch, December 12, 1914.

"His manner of presentation in the adagio was calmness and dignity itself, and under his facile manipulation his instrument filled the large hall with a flood of melody. He received a veritable ovation at the conclusion of the number, in which everybody in the house, the director and all the members of the orchestra heartily joined."—St. Louis Globe Democrat, December 13, 1914.

Christine Schutz's Appearances.

Christine Schutz, who has been winning extensive favorable notice this season, is an American and was born not so many years ago in Baltimore, Md. Although she received her early education in Germany, she began her vocal studies at the age of seventeen under the direction of David Melamet, the gifted teacher of Baltimore. After spending some time in Berlin, where she studied with Georg Fergusson, she returned to New York to receive instruction from Oscar Saenger.

For a number of years Miss Schutz was the leading contralto soloist at Brown Memorial Church, Baltimore, and also sang at the Madison Avenue Temple in the same city. Local societies are delighted when they can secure her services, and she has at various times been soloist with the Baltimore Arion, the Mozart Maennerchor and other prominent choruses. Nor has her popularity been confined to her native city. During last July she twice appeared as soloist before the New York State Music Teachers' Association convention at Saratoga. There she sang in Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and in a special performance of "Trovatore," in both of which she was delightful.

Miss Schutz possesses a clear, ringing contralto voice, which she controls with ease. Her interpretations show a deep poetic insight as well as thorough musicianship. In addition, she is gifted with a charming personality, which makes her an especial favorite wherever she appears.

At the Worcester Musical Festival this past fall and the festivals at Bangor and Portland, Me., she distinguished herself through her thoughtful and earnest work, winning, by her consummate art, the praise of both critics and audience.

Miss Schutz is now living in New York, having placed herself in the hands of that capable manager of artists, Walter Anderson.

A CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS

Victor Harris has promised to conduct the chorus of mixed voices, men and women, at the lighting of the Christmas Tree at Madison Square Park, New York, on Thursday, December 24, at 5:30. There will be no organized chorus present, but Mr. Harris is trying to get volunteers from all of the different clubs and choruses as well as from single individuals all over the city. It is sure that there will be a large and characteristic response for this worthy object under the direction of so noted a conductor as Mr. Harris.

The chorus is to meet and organize and to have its one rehearsal in Dr. Parkhurst's church, Madison Avenue and Twenty-fourth Street, on December 24, at 4:30, and later on at 5:30 go over to the stand built for them and there have a little concert of Christmas music which will last until six o'clock. If by any chance the weather be inclement, the singing will not take place in the Square, but will be given at the same hour, 5:30, in Dr. Parkhurst's church. All singers, men and women, are invited to join the committee at Dr. Parkhurst's church on the afternoon of December 24 at 4:30, to take their share in what is really the most direct evidence of the Christmas spirit that any one can think of.

Gifted Anna Baugher

Anna Baugher, the gifted Baltimore contralto who is undertaking her first protracted concert tour this season, is no novice in the professional field, as she has made many previous public appearances and scored decisive successes on all such occasions.

The Baltimore Sonntag's Post alluded to her (when she gave a joint recital with Anton Witek) as "an artist predestined for the concert career," the German correspondent spoke of the "musical and vocal significance of her art, "and described her voice as a "large, dramatically colored and well sounding contralto, with powerful high tones, and full, rich low ones." The same paper praised Miss Baugher's interpretations enthusiastically and spoke of the excellent schooling received by her at the hands of David Melamet. The Baltimore News waxes eloquent over the young artist's splendid physique, her musical taste and refinement, and dramatic instincts.

Miss Baugher's tour is booking under the direction of Foster & Foster, and she is sure to make a decisive step forward this winter toward the attainment of a place with the artistically and materially successful contraltos in the concert world.

Kasner String Quartet in Brooklyn.

On Friday, December 4, the Kasner String Quartet, in conjunction with the Corinthian Male Quartet, gave a concert at All Souls' Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. The string quartet, of which Jacques Kasner is the director and first violin, played Haydn's "Vogel" quartet; Taubert's "Liebes Liedchen"; a Chopin etude with incidental solo well performed by Russell B. Kingman, the cello soloist, and Boccherini's "Minuetto." The ensemble work of this quartet is excellent, and its tonal balance throughout the evening was on a high artistic plane. The interpretations were broad and dignified. An audience of appreciative listeners was liberal with its applause.

Reception to Eleanor Spencer.

Charles J. Livengood and Mrs. Livengood gave a reception at their home at Walnut Hill, Cincinnati, Ohio, for Eleanor Spencer, on Thursday afternoon, December 3, to which were invited the board of managers and directors of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, beside many others prominent musically and socially. They included Dr. Ernst Kunwald, Charles P. Taft, Stillman-Kelley, the Misses Bauer (of the Cincinnati Conservatory), Marcian Thalberg, Mr. Evans, Mrs. Holmes and Mrs. Freiberg.

Culbertson to Manage Bori.

Harry Culbertson, the enterprising manager who makes his headquarters in Chicago, and his associate, Maurice Lee Fulcher, were in the East the latter part of last week. They have concluded arrangements whereby Lucrezia Bori, the Metropolitan Opera soprano, is now under their exclusive management. Among the other attractions under the management of Harry Culbertson are Tilly Koenen, Jenny Dufau, Frederick Morley and the Zoellner Quartet.

McCormack to Sing Ganz Songs.

Arthur P. Schmidt will soon publish two new English songs by Rudolph Ganz, which he wrote for John McCormack. They are entitled "Rise o' Star" and "Love and Song." Mr. McCormack will sing these during the season.

KNUTE REINDAHL, THE CHICAGO VIOLIN MAKER.

Prominent Builder of Violins, Violos and Cellos—Works in an Atelier Alive with Fascinating Interest.

JOACHIM'S HEAD.
Carved on Franz von Vecsey's violin.

Knute Reindahl, the Chicago violin maker, was unanimously elected president of the American Academy of Violin Makers at its organization, February 25, 1914.

Mr. Reindahl and his remarkable work are best described in the following detailed account that appeared in the MUSICAL COURIER several years ago, and which is still timely:

"A visit to Knute Reindahl's atelier (the Athenaeum Building in Van Buren street, Chicago) in many ways suggests the Capuchin crypt in Rome. Of this crypt Mark Twain writes: 'The place is upholstered in skeletons.' The mural decorations there, and even some hanging baskets, are constructed of the bones of departed monks—a decorative scheme quite as impressive as it is unique.

"Mr. Reindahl's atelier is literally 'decorated' with the 'bones' of violins, violas and cellos. There is timber, finely grained and finely seasoned, for the making of new instruments: there are new instruments all ready to be launched upon the career of greatness, and there are new instruments in all stages of construction—some of these only mere 'skeletons,' often without a 'head' or a 'back.' And then there are old violins in all stages of dissolution that have been, like watches, left to Mr. Reindahl's expert care for restoration of their former usefulness. Some of these need new ribs, others new backs, and some need regraduating. In fact, every stage of violin dissolution, and every stage of violin construction may be viewed here side by side.

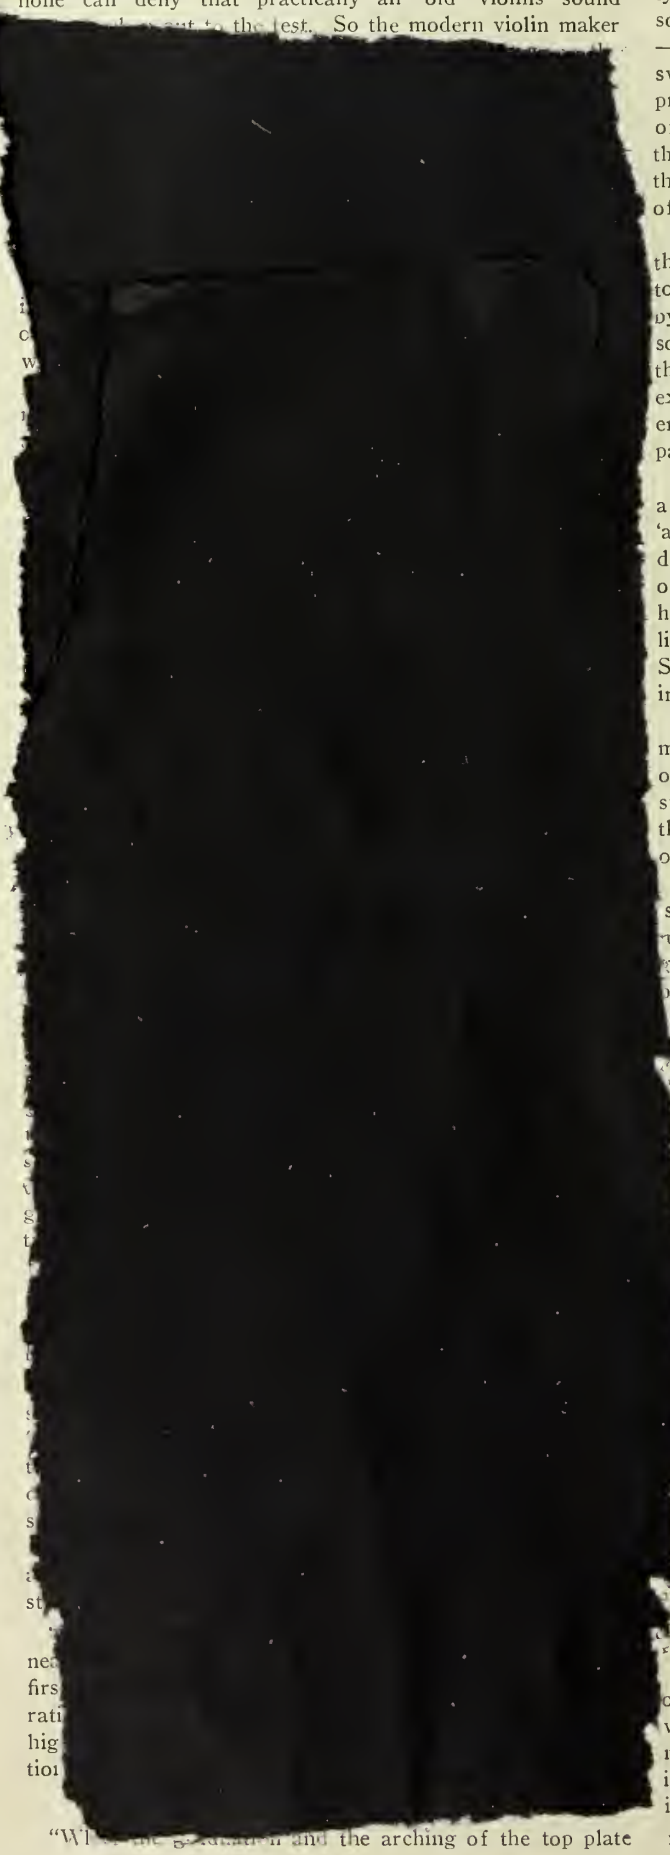
"But Mr. Reindahl's work appeals to the visitor with more force than his workroom. And—peculiarly enough—his work is what one might term 'unintelligible,' as the visitors see only the 'visible' evidences of his work—the handsomely carved scrolls, beautifully rounded sides, tops, gracefully arched and inlaid with delicate purling, bold but delicately wrought soundholes, and piquant corners whose very sharpness lends an appearance of delicacy—while Mr. Reindahl's real work—the tone itself—is not in evidence. The scrape of his knife alone breaks the stillness.

Working "In Sound."

"The violin maker 'works' in sound much the same as the potter works in clay, or the painter in paint, or the sculptor in marble, but with this distinction—he makes his 'sound' while the sculptor finds his marble ready made.

"To make 'sound,' one might think, is a very simple process. Yet it is very complex in the case of a violin.

"In the making of sound, or, rather, in the 'placing' of sound where it may be called forth to delight the ear at any time, there is endless difficulty. Nature gives man the art of painting, as it were, ready made. For the painter the sun sets and rises, the summer glows, and the woods change so slowly and softly beneath his gaze that he has time to chronicle every tint before it passes away. All forms of beauty, from a supreme outline of the human body to the filmy speck of the minutest insect, constantly limning themselves upon the retina of the painter's eye, until his sensitive brain is supplied with objects of enchanting loveliness, which he is at liberty to reproduce and recombine at will.



HAND CARVED HEAD FOR ART VIOLIN.

"Nature not only provides the painter with fair forms and rich colors, but she also teaches him the magical art of selection and arrangement. But what has nature done for the maker of sweet sounds? True, she has given him sound—crude and unrefined, but not sweet sound—music.

The Fount of Sound.

"Nowhere does there fall upon the violin maker's ear, as he walks through the world of nature, such an arrangement of consecutive sounds as can be called a musical subject or theme or melody. Far less does he find anything which can be described as a musical harmony. The cuckoo, who often sings a true third or a fourth, is the nearest approach to music in nature, though this tuneful bird gets less credit for his vocal powers than almost any other.

"And what the violin maker cannot find in nature neither can he find in other musical instruments. True, the piano, the harp and some of the brass and reed instruments, produce very sweet music—but not to be compared with violin music. Nor can the violin maker of today hold to the musty tradition that a Stradivarius violin represents the pinnacle of perfection in violin tone. In Strad's day, Strad tone probably, assuredly, answered all requirements. But today, with our very large auditorium, and with our standard of pitch for orchestras fixed at A with 435 vibrations, none can deny that practically all 'old' violins sound [illegible] to the test. So the modern violin maker

"W[illegible] and the arching of the top plate is vital, yet a perfectly graduated top plate does not constitute a perfect violin. The grain of the wood—seemingly a trifle—is very important, and the age and proper seasoning of the wood are more important. Then the degree of density in wood, and degree of arching in the back plate play most important roles in the tone of the violin. An arch too low or too high—in either the front or the back plate—invariably operates to annul either quality or volume of tone, and the location and the size of the f holes are other vital features.

"In fact, every part in the anatomy of the violin plays an important part — the blocks, the linings, the ribs, and every other part—even to the little soundpost. Each organ in the anatomy of the violin has a given function, and when all parts perform their functions harmoniously, the result is the sweetest sound mortal ears ever hear—violin tone that is rich, sweet, far carrying and expressive. The 'functions' of the various organs within the anatomy of the violin are not unlike the functions of the various organs which produce the tone and intonation of the human voice.

HAND CARVED HEAD FOR ART VIOLIN.

The lungs pressing out the air through their little pipes; the larynx stretching its delicate chords and tuning them to the shade of tone desired; the tongue, teeth and lips, by their many forms and combinations, articulating the sounds; and the chest, throat and nose, by their sympathetic resonating cavities, giving richness to the voice, and expressing the exact shade of affection, disdain, or other emotion we would express—all these have their counterparts in the violin's anatomy.

"Like Stradivarius, himself, Mr. Reindahl is first of all a wood carver of the highest artistic stand. And his 'artistic conscience,' as Elbert Hubbard might say, is evidenced in all his handiwork, from the texture and color of his varnish to the rounding off of the button which holds the tailpiece and is it any wonder then that artists like Hartmann, Kocian, Listemann, Kreisler, Kubelik and Sauret pronounce 'Reindahl Violins' Marvels (?) in power, in sweetness, and in capacity for portraying emotion.

"Of the 'Reindahl Grand Model' an admirer writes: 'The model, while it shows that you worship at the shrine of old Antonio, shows that while you stoop to imitate you stop to conquer at the same motion, and this model bears the stamp of originality and the hall-mark of genius all over its beautiful form.'

"Artists know the rarity of violins whose tones are sweet,' from lowest G to A in altissimo. You know how much you desire a violin whose tone qualities are distinguished in power, intensity, brilliance, evenness, sympathy, perfection of open fifths, stop fifths, thirds, octaves, clear harmonics, pure pizzicato, tones distinct in shake, trill and staccato, and withal quickly responsive to bow pressure from [illegible]l pianissimo to fortissimo. If you have such a violin, you [illegible]ay not be interested; if you have not, know that such are [illegible]ade in this day and generation—and in Chicago."

Excerpts from the text of Mr. Reindahl's brochure, "An [illegible]tist's Touch," are herewith reproduced:

"An artist's handling of his instrument is always loving, [illegible] it is a strenuous affec[illegible]n, sparing nothing in the [illegible]rch for volume and [illegible]er either in cantabile or [illegible]vouri technic. Not only [illegible]his affection loving and [illegible]nuous; it is exacting, [illegible]n hypercritical. It de[illegible]nds of the upper posi[illegible]ns tones equaling in in[illegible]nsity the tones of the [illegible]wer positions, and de[illegible]ands of all positions tones [illegible] sufficient largeness to [illegible]ominate the largest of [illegible]resent-day music halls.

AN EXACT REPRODUCTION AND PEG BOX OF A STRADIVARIUS ITALIAN ZITHER.

Dated 1700. Said to represent Diana. The satyr and nymph behind the peg box serve to form a crook or handle for supporting the instrument.

"Artists know the rarity of violins—old or modern—whose tones are 'sweet' and mellow from lowest G to A in altissimo, distinguished in intensity, brilliance, evenness and sympathy; true in open and stopped fifths, in thirds and octaves; clear in harmonics; distinct in trill, shake, vibrato and staccato; pure in pizzicato, and harmonious in the double stops and arpeggios, and withal quickly responsive to bow-pressure from real pianissimo to the most pronounced fortissimo.

"Such a violin—if old—commands a high price, positively a prohibitive price to the average violinist.

"More than any other one contributing factor in the decline in popularity of 'old' violins for solo purposse has been the discovery that 'old' violins can become too old. Time leaves its traces on the violin as on all things worldly, and today the number of 'old' violins powerful enough to fill our greatest auditoriums with sweet, sensuous tone is small indeed.

"So, it may be said, the increase in the size of music halls today as compared to those of other days, and the detrimental effect produced upon violins by age—beyond a certain age—have contributed equally to the lessening popularity of the 'old' and the increasing popularity of the 'modern' violin for both ensemble and solo performance.

"The artist of today and tomorrow must choose among the modern violins, unless possessed of unlimited finances wherewith to purchase one of the few 'old' violins which have not succumbed, in a tonal sense, to the ravages of time.

"The excellence of the Reindahl violin begins in the wood of which it is constructed. For the top-plate (soundboard), Norwegian spruce of great age is selected. This spruce is secured, by personal visit, from the ancient cities of Norway, most of it being taken from very old buildings.

"Most of this Norwegian spruce was cut long before Columbus sailed for America, and some of it has been seasoning, in buildings, for as long as six or seven hundred years!

"The climate of Norway is cold and dry, and the spruce has, in consequence, great uniformity in grain; is crisp, and retains its great vitality after long years of seasoning. In fact, the Norwegian spruce grows in climate very similar to the climate of the Alps—from whence most of the spruce used in Cremona was secured.

"For back and sides, either American or European maple is used. Both hemispheres produce choice maple, and the selection depends entirely upon acoustic properties, beauty of grain and flare."

THE LUTHIER, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

"Art is, was, and always will be, the expression of individuality. Remove the individuality of the worker, and there remains but a bare mechanical process.

"This is true of the industrial arts and of the fine arts, and especially true of every branch of musical art.

"Your orchestral performer, who follows the score and the leader's baton with mathematical precision, seldom reaches the virtuoso stage, and your virtuoso, if put in an orchestra chair, lives at loggerheads with four-part harmony. His technic refuses to be bridled by the score or baton, but breaks out and runs wild in trills and runs and harmonics entirely unsuited to a modest post in the orchestra.

HAND CARVED HEAD FOR ART VIOLIN (BACK VIEW).

"Individuality is the art and individuality is the artist: It is a dual personality—a body and a soul—which transcends all laws, all lines, all limitations. Were it otherwise, we would have no art and no artists.

"There isn't now, never was, and never will be, a 'standard' of art. No metric system, no avoirdupois, none of the axioms of algebra, apply. Set a rule, a law, a limitation—and you drive out art!

"Wagner is a monument raised on broken laws. De Salo is another. Amati, Stradivarius, Stainer, Giuseppe Guarnerius are others. Originality — individuality — disregard of precedent—these names stand for these qualities of heart, mind and hand."

The brochure concludes with a short biographical sketch of Mr. Reindahl by W. W. Oldson.

Any one desiring to purchase a fine violin or knowing some one else who is interested, should secure a copy of the brochure. It will be sent carriage paid, on request to Knute Reindahl, Athenaeum Building, 59 East Van Buren street, Chicago, Ill.

NEWARKERS BUSY CHRISTMAS WEEK.

Numerous Chorus and Choir Rehearsals Make Holiday Season a Strenuous One —Music Notes.

Newark, N. J., December 21, 1914.

Just at this time Newark is preparing for a busy Christmas week. Nevertheless, the musicians of the city find time for the numerous musical events that are continually taking place, in addition to the many choir and club rehearsals now so frequent, and the annual shopping tours that one finds so necessary at this season of the year.

While church music seems to be the principal topic of conversation just now, a great deal of work is being accomplished for concerts to be given after the holidays. The Newark Music Festival Chorus will meet this week as usual and it is expected that the majority of members will be present. At first it was thought wise to discontinue these meetings until after the beginning of the New Year, but at the request of a large number of the members, it was decided to continue as heretofore. The next rehearsal, therefore, will be held Wednesday evening, December 23, in the Central High School.

Because Christmas Eve and New Year's Eve both fall on Thursday evening, the weekly meeting night for the Jersey City Festival Chorus has been postponed until January 7, when a full attendance is expected at the Lincoln High School.

REINDAHL CELLO BACK.

On Wednesday evening, December 30, the Newark Chorus rehearsal will be shortened so that the monthly musical program can be given. Arrangements are being made to hold a holiday dance in the large gymnasium of the High School following the program, to which the entire chorus is to be invited.

DORA BECKER SHAFFER'S LECTURE-RECITAL.

A violin lecture recital that is proving exceedingly popular in this city as well as elsewhere is that given recently by Dora Becker Shaffer, the violinist. Mrs. Shaffer gave one of her delightful programs at the South Side High School, this city, on December 7 last, which was well attended.

MUSIC NOTES.

Numerous articles of interest commenting upon the Newark Music Festival, to be held next May, are constantly appearing in various newspapers and magazines in different parts of the country. That Newark is receiving a large amount of publicity there can be no question. The January issue of the American Musician (New York) has devoted an entire page to the Newark concerts under the title of "What a Music Festival Means to a City."

Sulli Pupils in Interesting Program.

People usually attend pupils' recitals because of their friendship for the teacher or their relationship to some particular pupil. The audience, however, which comfortably filled the auditorium of Labor Temple, Fourteenth street and Second avenue, New York, on Tuesday evening, December 15, cannot be classed in this category of "invited person," since an admission fee was charged for the benefit of the Belgium Relief Fund. It can be understood easily why a goodly sum was raised, when one considers the kind of recital which the pupils of Giorgio M. Sulli, the vocal maestro of New York, customarily presented their friends. The following is the program given at this time: Romance from "Simon Boccanegra" (Verdi), Sterling Hall; "Amarella" (J. M. Winne), "The Brook" (Dolores), Juanita S. Jessup; "For a Dream's Sake" (A. W. Kramer), "God's Gift" (A. H. Brewer), Augusta G. Barker; prayer and duet from "Gioconda" (Ponchelli), Allie Coleman Pierce and Anna Byrd; valse from "Romeo and Juliet" (Gounod), Loretta J. Hallisy; aria from "La Donna del Lago" (Rossini), Frieda Klink; cavatina from "Don Sebastiano" (Donizetti), John M. Black; duet from "Madame Butterfly" (Puccini), Claire B. Bell and William H. Gleim; slumber song from "Philemon and Baucis" (Gounod), [illegible] Hall; melody from "La Forza del Destino" (Verdi), [illegible] E. Friedel; duet from "Aida" (Verdi), Gladys Morrison and Anna Byrd; Mimi's Narrative from "Boheme" (Puccini), Claire B. Bell; aria from "Pagliacci" (Leoncavallo), William H. Gleim; "Cavatina," from "Traviata" (Verdi), Adalgisa Barbieri; trio from "La Gioconda" (Ponchielli), Allie Coleman Pierce, Anna Byrd and John Walsh.

Sterling Hall, who is the bass soloist of the Labor Temple quartet, is a proof positive of what an earnest student can accomplish under the tutorship of a good teacher; his voice has gained greatly in power, pose, resonance and artistic rendition since he was heard last spring.

Juanita S. Jessup, soprano, and Augusta G. Barker, contralto, who have studied but three months with Mr. Sulli, have voices which promise much for their future success.

Particular mention should be made of the work of Anna Byrd, contralto soloist of the Labor Temple Quartet, who disposed of the difficult task assigned her with the confidence in her artistic qualities which makes the thorough artist. She displayed a voice of rich and sonorous quality with a wide range in the prayer and duet from "Gioconda," which gave her an opportunity to show her dramatic feeling. In the trio from the same opera and in the duet from "Aida," where a wide range of voice and deep emotion are required, she was at her best, and it is undoubtedly safe to prophesy a brilliant career for her.

Allie Coleman Pierce is the possessor of a dramatic soprano voice of unusual power. The role of Gioconda is one which requires a powerful organ and a highly artistic temperament, qualities which she possesses and which will undoubtedly aid her in accomplishing a high ideal.

Belle Koskoff, who was in the audience, was asked to substitute for another soprano who was ill, and in the romanza from "Cavalleria Rusticana" proved her voice to be a splendid dramatic organ. In fact, she has been singing with the Manon Opera Company, with whom she has been winning marked approval.

Frieda Klink gave a satisfying rendition of the difficult arias by Rossini and Handel. Her voice is a pure contralto, with a tinge of the melancholy and with a mellow quality that is not soon forgotten.

John M. Black, whose singing of the aria from "Don Sebastiano" was heartily applauded, has a voice of excellent baritone quality.

Claire B. Bell, who was heard in the aria from "Boheme" as well as the duet from "Madame Butterfly," exhibited clear enunciation and appropriate phrasing.

The lovely tenor voice of William H. Gleim is continually improving and is now apparently equal to the demands made upon it. His rendering of the arias from "Madame Butterfly" and "Pagliacci" was a source of delight to the audience.

The duet from "Aida" revealed the excellent soprano voice of Gladys Morrison, which voice will probably make of her a well known singer, if she continues to improve as she has during the year she has spent under the Sulli guidance.

Adalgisa Barbieri, soprano, sang the cavatina from "Traviata" according to the traditions of the old bel canto, and in response to the enthusiastic applause gave a song from "The Firefly."

The trio from "Gioconda," well sung by Allie Pierce, Anna Byrd and John Walsh, made a fitting finale for a delightful evening.

Baroness von Klenner's Musicale.

The third of a series of studio recitals was given on Thursday in the Von Klenner Studios, New York. As is the rule, the studios were filled with a fashionable and critical audience, interested not only in the singers furnishing the program, but also in the unusual selections rendered. Mme. von Klenner is noted for her wide musical knowledge and her pupils have a catholicity of taste rarely found in a studio. Teaching in four languages, an authority on tradition, and a knowledge of the modern compositions obtained from personal association and study with all the modern composers, Mme. von Klenner shows by the work of her large classes the value of her splendid preparation as a teacher. Her pupils, singing in grand opera, oratorio, concerts and teaching in all the large cities of the country, are her best advertisers; for her clientele consists mostly of pupils who come to New York with the express purpose of studying with this exponent of the famous Garcia method. Perfect breath control, beautiful tone placement, and intelligent comprehension of the composer's meaning were illustrated.

Gabrilowitsch Recital.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will give a piano recital in Aeolian Hall, Monday afternoon, January 4, playing among other numbers the Beethoven "Pathétique," sonata the Brahms variations and fugue on a theme by Handel, seven etudes of Chopin, and compositions of Tscherepnin, Smetana, Sapellnikoff, and Liszt.

CENTURY OPERA COMPANY IN CHICAGO.

"Boheme," December 14.

The Century Opera Company opened its fourth week at the Auditorium with a most creditable performance of "La Boheme." Helen Stanley was the Mimi, a role well suited to her charming personality and well within the range of her voice, which never has been heard to better advantage in any other role. She covered herself with glory by a most artistic interpretation of the heroine of the Puccini romantic opera and beyond doubt she won the honors of the evening. Morgan Kingston as Rudolph shared with Miss Stanley in the success of the night. He was in fine fettle and sang especially well the aria in the first act. Thomas Chalmers as Marcel was a potent factor in the splendid ensemble; likewise Henry Weldon, who as Colline scored heavily. Bertha Shalek was a vivacious and well voiced Musetta. The orchestra was under the direction of Agide Jacchia, who returned after an absence of over a week to the conductor's stand, where his presence was felt all through the opera, the score being given an illuminative reading under his forceful baton.

"Lohengrin," December 15.

The second performance of "Lohengrin" was given with practically the same cast as heard the previous week, the only change being the substitution of Augusta Lenska as Ortrud. The role at the first performance was taken by Kathleen Howard.

"Lucia," December 16 (Matinee).

"Lucia" was the opera offered for the matinee bill and it was given a most commendable performance by the Century Company. Although time-worn there are any number of people who enjoy the melodies of this opera. Florence Macbeth was the sweet voiced heroine and her singing of the "Mad Scene" was excellent. Miss Macbeth has done splendid work during the season, but nothing better than her Lucia. Orville Harrold was the Edgar Kreidler as Ashton was in fine form. This artist impresses more favorably at each appearance and makes a commanding figure of every part he portrays. The balance of the roles was in capable hands and Zuro conducted in good style.

"La Boheme," December 16 and 19.

"Boheme" was repeated with the same cast on Wednesday and Saturday nights, Helen Stanley again being the bright star of both performances. On Saturday evening the last performance of the season of "Boheme" took place.

"Carmen," December 17 (Evening) and 19 (Matinee).

The last performance of Bizet's masterpiece by the Century Opera Company took place on Saturday afternoon. The cast was the same as heard at previous performances with the exception of Myrna Sharlow, who was the Micaela. Miss Sharlow disclosed in the aria of the third act a brilliant soprano voice, large in volume and wide in compass. She did herself justice and won the full approval of the audience.

MacDowell Club Recital.

A joint recital to be given by Alexander Bloch, violinist; Paolo Martucci, pianist; and Eva Gauthier, soprano, is announced by the Music Committee of the MacDowell Club, New York, Walter L. Bogert, chairman, for Tuesday evening, December 29. This will take place in the club rooms.

Through the influence of the Dutch Government, Miss Gauthier was allowed to reside in the palace of the Sultan of Java for the purpose of studying the native songs and folklore. She will sing Javanese and Malay songs in costume.

The program will be as follows:

Alois Trnka Soloist with the Liederkranz.

Alois Trnka, the Bohemian violinist, is engaged as soloist with the Liederkranz Society of New York, at one of its regular concerts to be given on January 9.

This is the outcome of the young violinist's appearance last season at the New York Athletic Club with the Liederkranz, where he was very successful as soloist on that evening.

Henrietta Foster Wescott's Success.

Henrietta Foster Wescott is meeting with splendid success in her school lectures in her American Indian program, which is one of the best and most instructive subjects in the school work of the cities where she has appeared. On Friday, December 11 she gave her program at School 20, Danforth avenue, Jersey City, before an enthusiastic audience of over 800 persons. On December 6 Mrs. Westcott sang at the Elks' memorial services in Bloomfield, this being the second year's engagement. She will sing at the night workers' service at St. Paul's, New York City, on Christmas morning at 3 o'clock. Mrs.

JERSEY CITY SCHOOLS.

Your lecture I found very interesting and instructive. Personally, I shall recommend it very highly. CHARLES LILLIS, Dickinson High School.

A large number gathered in the high school auditorium Wednesday to witness the pleasant program presented by Henrietta Foster Wescott in the second of the Public Lecture Courses given by the Rahway Board of Education. Washington Soprano Pleases in Concert.

A unique and interesting concert was given recently in Washington, D. C., for the benefit of the Belgians. The affair was under the management of the Countess Dumas, and many of the society women of the Capital City were among the patronesses. As a soloist at this concert Helen Donohue DeYo, soprano, achieved a noteworthy success. She sang a new song cycle by Frederick Knight Logan. The theme was "In a Brahmin Garden," and she wore a quaint Moorish costume. This cycle is subdivided as follows: "Lo, 'Tis the Hour," "Fair Rahda," "Ganges Boat Song" and "Krishna's Lament." Mme. DeYo has a truly beautiful voice and marked dramatic instinct, which lend themselves readily to interpretations which are expressive and full of interest. The subdued fire and passion of her voice in these plaintive songs of the East, were thoroughly characteristic of the Orient.

HELEN DONOHUE DE YO.

As an encore Mme. DeYo gave that delightful song, "Fairy Pipers," with all its dainty charm.

Jan Sickesz Plays.

A sensitive and truly musical performance of Beethoven's "Moonlight" sonata (although the composer did not so describe the work, it is nevertheless a very suitable appellation) opened the piano recital of Jan Sickesz at Aeolian Hall on Thursday afternoon, December 17, and at once stamped him as an artitst to be listened to with respect, an impression confirmed and deepened in fact by the second number of the Sickesz list, Schumann's gigantic fantasia in C major, op. 17. Had the concert giver played nothing else all afternoon except those two monumental test pieces, his hearers would have hade had to concede his exceptional abilities and magnetic talents, but in addition he gave also two intermezzi (A flat, and B flat minor), the B minor capriccio, and the E flat rhapsody, by Brahms, two Rachmaninoff preludes (in B major and G minor), a Liszt's "Petrarca" sonnet, and the same composer's sixth Hungarian rhapsody, and played the shorter numbers with such a variety of attractive tonal and interpretative nuances that no doubt was left of his complete equipment as a virtuoso of authority and rank.

Sickesz is no new appearance in New York, his debut here a few years ago being remembered with pleasure by connoisseurs of good piano playing, but while he then revealed merely promise, he now presents achievements that reflect artistic ripeness and matured individuality. He has large musical grasp, sympathetic temperament, an unusually incisive manner of revealing the structural lines of the compositions he reads, and a decided vein of imaginative feeling. His touch is modulated with uncommon resource, his pedalling exhibits subtle understanding of tonal shadings, and his technic is of that satisfying variety which relieves the listener of all apprehension and permits the interpreter to give himself altogether to the work in hand without thought of mechanical obstacles.

Sickesz has a most pleasing personality and this helped to capture his audience unequivocally. They insisted on encores and bowing reappearances and made the success of the recital a thing that was patent to all. A pianist like Jan Sickesz has every right to be heard frequently in New York, even in a season like the present one, which promises sooner or later to parade publicly for us all the giants of the keyboard.

Simon in Charge of Tree Choral Service.

Washington, D. C., is to have a community Christmas tree, which will stand in the east plaza of the Capitol and will tower at least sixty feet above the ground. On the afternoon of December 24 there will be impressive services in connection with this tree, which is intended to symbolize the tree of spiritual Christmas. Under the direction of Otto Torney Simon, conductor of the Motet Choral Society, a chorus of more than two thousand voices will sing "O Come Emmanuel," "O Little Town of Bethlehem," "O Come, All Ye Faithful," "Hark! The Herald Angels Sing," "Stille Nacht," "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," closing with the "Star Spangled Banner." This chorus will be arranged tier above tier on the central steps of the Capitol, while above them unique tableaux, illustrating the hymns sung, will be staged under the direction of Mrs. J. P. Neligh. The United States Marine Band, William H. Santelmann, conductor, will play Beethoven's "Creation Hymn" and Adams' "Cantique de Noel."

A similar service was held last year and made a deep and lasting impression. The religious spirit and reverence were so great that it reminded one of the old miracle plays of medieval days. It was estimated that at least 40,000 spectators crowded the immense plaza, many of them being on their knees during certain portions of the program, while the silence of a church service marked the entire program.

Paul Dufault's Busy Season.

Paul Dufault's season is excellent. He returned last week from a fortnight's tour of Canada, where he sang in several of the music-loving French-Canadian cities with his usual success. Arrived in New York, he sang at the Plaza Hotel Thursday morning musicale, December 17, appearing in an eighteenth century costume with Felice Lyne, in songs of the period. This made a great hit with the audience, leading to most favorable pronouncements and general applause, with inquiry for his services by those who heard him. Few tenors have that sincere, heartfelt quality of voice throughout the entire range, which characterizes Dufault, and few have his personal magnetism, which at once establishes close sympathy between singer and hearer. This is not to be gained by study, but is a personal element, counting for much, and goes far to explain Dufault's popularity.

Capture of the Kaiser's chief bandmaster will be hailed in Paris as an indication that the French campaign is proceeding to beat the band.—Newark, N. J., Star.

ST. LOUIS CONCERTS.

St. Louis, Mo., December 16, 1914.

Theodore Spiering, the noted conductor and violinist, who is a native of this city, was the soloist at the Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Spiering was received most enthusiastically. He gave a masterly performance of Bruch's G minor concerto, No. 1, playing the work with brilliant technic, deep sentiment and fine musicianship. He is without question one of the leading fiddlers of our day. The orchestra, under Max Zach, played the following numbers: Dramatic overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick; symphony No. 2, C major, Schumann; "Caprice Espagnol," Rimsky-Korsakow. This program was repeated Saturday night, when Mr. Spiering was obliged to respond to an encore, which was his own "Study in Trills"; this is indeed a delightful work.

SIXTH SUNDAY "POP."

The St. Louis Symphony Orchestra presented an interesting program in a capable manner, Sunday afternoon. Among Conductor Zach's offerings were a first time number, Coleridge-Taylor's "Scenes from an Imaginary Ballet." Another first time number was Grieg's "Erotik" for string orchestra.

PAVLOWA AND HER BALLET.

Anna Pavlowa, with her company of dancers and orchestra, gave two performances on Monday. The large audience applauded generously.

"CHANSONETTES EN CRINOLINE."

A delightful program was given at Temple Israel, Thursday afternoon, by Rosalind Sternberg in costume, assisted by Rodney Saylor, pianist. Miss Sternberg has a dramatic voice of fine quality, which was revealed in her variety of songs. Mr. Saylor was heard to advantage in piano solos, and he also acted as accompanist for Miss Sternberg.

UNIVERSITY MUSICAL RESEARCH CLUB.

The University Musical Research Club, of which Vera Schlueter is the president, gave a recital on Saturday afternoon at Baldwin Hall. Those taking part were the Misses Schlueter and Miles, Mesdames Servan, Butts, Growenback, Cornealy and Murphy.

WASHINGTON UNIVERSITY ORCHESTRA.

The Washington University Orchestra gave its first concert of the season at Founder's Hall, December 15.

ST. LOUIS NOTES.

The first concert of the season was given by the St. Louis Orchestra Club, consisting of ninety men and women who are devoted to orchestral music as a pastime. This affair was held in the auditorium of the Central High School, under the direction of Frank Gecks. Mary M .Allen contributed several contralto solos.

Jospeh C. Erman, pianist, gave a recital at his studio last Monday, assisted by George C. Tandy, baritone, and Ella Webster Taylor, soprano. A large gathering of musical friends was in attendance.

Henry H. Walser gave an organ recital December 14 at St. Luke's Evangelical Church, assisted by Louise Kramer and Mrs. J. Werner, vocalists.

Paul Freiss, organist of Dr. Frye Memorial M. E. Church, gave a recital, December 10, assisted by Elizabeth Platte, vocalist.

MAY BIRDIE DITZLER.

Gabrilowitsch with New York Symphony.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch was soloist with the New York Symphony Society on Friday and Sunday afternoons, December 18 and 20. He played Rachmaninoff's second concerto and proved himself to be in entire sympathy with this greatest modern composer of the Russian school. Mr. Gabrilowitsch possesses a large firm tone and great clarity and lucidity of technic; his passage work is sharp and well defined, and his use of the pedal sufficient to assure sonority but never excessive. His interpretation of this concerto was thoroughly musicianly and showed him to be a player genuinely inspired by poetic instinct and deep feeling. His success was very pronounced and he was rewarded by long continued applause.

The orchestra numbers at these concerts were the symphony in C minor by Saint-Saëns and Debussy's "Iberia." This rarely heard work of Saint-Saëns, which is dedicated to the memory of Franz Liszt, of whom the composer was an ardent admirer and an intimate personal friend, shows Saint-Saëns' value as a writer of symphonic music to be rather limited. Even taking into consideration that Saint-Saëns belongs to a former generation, it is difficult to find much for genuine admiration in this work. The composer evidently took himself seriously and has overloaded his score with instruments, including piano, organ, double bassoon, bass clarinet, English horn, and indeed almost every instrument that could be used in producing the color of the modern orchestra, and with all this the composer fails to effect any important color schemes whatever. The orchestra played well and won measurable applause from the audience.

Shown herewith is the portrait of Yeatman Griffith, the vocal teacher who recently opened his New York studio, having transferred his activities from London. Mr. Griffith is the teacher of Florence Macbeth, the American coloratura soprano.

Russian Bayan Quartet at Columbia.

At Horace Mann auditorium of Columbia University, New York, the Russian Bayan Quartet made its first public appearance on Wednesday evening, December 16. This quartet, which is composed of Nina Dimitrieff, soprano; Constance Purdy, contralto; George Harris, Jr., tenor; and Bernard Olshansky, bass, are banded together for the express purpose of presenting to the people of this country the secular vocal music of Russia.

The quartet was heard in the following: "Down by Mother Volga," folksong; "The Elder Blossoms," Kopylov; "In the Meadows," folksong; and four songs by Cui, "The Veil of Twilight," "The Waters," "Echo," and "Famine."

A feature of these songs was that they were given unaccompanied, all the other numbers being sympathetically aided by Mabel Hammond at the piano. Each member of the quartet sang two solos, and there were three duets and a trio. The selection of the works covered a wide field, viz., compositions by Rubinstein, Borodine, Moussorgsky, Gliere, Tschaikowsky, Rachmaninoff and Cui.

The audience was appreciative and accorded each singer due meed of applause, the entire evening undoubtedly being a genuine success.

Paderewski Influences American Pianist.

Paderewski was one of the deciding factors in the career of Florence Larrabee, the pianist. When a student at the New England Conservatory, Boston, she was chosen to play the Polish pianist's concerto at a pupils' reception in his honor. Delighted by her interpretation of his work, Paderewski wrote a flattering allusion to the incident in her score and predicted for her a successful public career.

Philharmonic's Interesting Program.

Under the direction of Josef Stransky, the Philharmonic Society of New York, gave a program of unusual interest at its concerts of December 17 and 18 in Carnegie Hall, New York. This program consisted of Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Scheherazade," Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," and Liszt's first Hungarian rhapsody. The playing of the "Scheherazade" suite was notable for its Oriental coloring, the solidity of the orchestra tone, and the perfect tonal balance throughout. The playing was brilliant at all times, but especially so in the final allegro. Special mention should be made of Maximilian Pilzer, concertmaster, for his beautiful performances of the solos, of which in this work there are many.

"Till Eulenspiegel," which of all Strauss' works appears to wear best, was given a delightfully humorous and intelligent rendering. It is evident that the Philharmonic players find themselves in entire sympathy with this composition and they brought out its every feature in a way that rendered the whole composition impressive and interesting in the extreme. Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody calls for no special comment.

The soloist of the evening was Edouardo Ferrari-Fontana, who scored such a success in New York upon his debut here last season at the Metropolitan Opera House in "L'Amore dei Tre Re." He sang Beethoven's "Adelaide" and an aria from "La Forza del Destino," Verdi. The great beauty of his voice was evident throughout the rendering of Beethoven's "Adelaide," and no less in evidence were his perfect vocal control and his immense reserve force. This work, however, is scarcely sufficiently dramatic to bring out the best of this genuinely fine artist's talent, and his strong dramatic ability and passionate fervor were shown to better advantage in Verdi's aria.

This was a most successful concert and both the orchestra and the soloist were accorded a veritable ovation.

Gabrilowitsch Program.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play a varied program at his recital in Aeolian Hall, Monday afternoon, January 4. Among other numbers the Russian pianist will perform the Beethoven sonata in A major, op. 2, No. 2, and the Brahms variations and fugue on a theme by Handel. There will likewise be six Chopin etudes, op. 10 and 25, the Tscherepnine "Humoresque," and compositions by Sapellnikoff and Moszkowski.

VIDA
Llewellyn
CONCERT PIANIST

Director Kaden presented another artist in Vida Llewellyn, a master at the piano. She played Hugo Kaun's concerto for piano and orchestra and proved herself an artist possessed of almost masculine power and temperament, as well as of excellent technic.—Salzbrunner Zeitung, June 20, 1914.

The pianist's strength lies in her conveying of musical intent with good workmanship.—Brooklyn Eagle, Nov. 15, 1914.

Finesse in tone, coloring, fleet fingers, a command of the higher literature of the piano and a liking for new and unhackneyed pieces distinguished the piano recital which Vida Llewellyn presented at Fine Arts Theatre yesterday afternoon.—Chicago Examiner, Nov. 23, 1914.

FEW SINGERS ARE WINNING MORE CONSISTENT SUCCESS IN CONCERT, RECITAL AND ORATORIO THAN

MARIE MORRISEY
CONTRALTO

PRESS COMMENTS ON HER APPEARANCE IN WATERBURY, CONN., DECEMBER 13TH:

"Madame Morrisey was warmly applauded. Her aria was extremely difficult, and the manner in which she rendered its passages was appreciated by her fascinated listeners."—Waterbury Republican.

"Marie Morrisey's fine physique and charming manner pleased no less than her rich contralto voice. Her first number was an Italian aria from the old opera, 'Adriano in Siria,' which was sung with fine artistic effect. The second number was a group of German songs, and the third a group of English songs, in all of which she was pleasing and received hearty applause."—Waterbury American.

"Marie Morrisey created a most favorable impression with the huge audience. Mme. Morrisey's debut was featured with tremendous applause. Her rendition of the aria proved one of the most pleasing numbers, and she responded to a well deserved encore."—Waterbury Evening Democrat.

The Seattle branch of the American Red Cross Society arranged a benefit concert at the Metropolitan Theatre, November 4, some of Seattle's most prominent musicians appearing. Mrs. Hunkins, Mrs. Donner, Ethel Myer, Milton Seymour and Judson Mather were the accompanists. The committee in charge of the concert was as follows: Mrs. Erastus Brainerd, Mrs. W. B. Gaffney, Mrs. Robert H. Boyle, Mrs. S. K. Waterman, Mrs. A. P. Hill and Mrs. George H. Snowdon. Handsome society girls served as ushers.

"Memories," an operatic idyl, by Charles Eugene Banks, poet, and Mary Carr Moore, composer, has just been announced. It is a musical sketch intended for vaudeville. The action represents the shades of Robert Burns (baritone) and Tom Moore (tenor) arriving at the rose garden in Naishapur, Persia, where Omar Khayyam (bass), the poet-astronomer, is entombed. It is dawn. The Muezzin is calling "Allah" from the sultan's towers. The temple bells are ringing. In the names of their beloved ones the Irish and Scotch poets summon Omar to come forth and sing again of their sweethearts. This he does and in the mystery of the early morning they sing new poems as well as old ones in honor of immortal love. Mrs. Moore's grand opera, "Narcisa," was produced here at the Moore Theatre two seasons ago. She has also written numerous smaller works.

A program by pupils of Mme. Hesse-Sprotte and Karl E. Tunberg was given at Recital Hall, Odd Fellows' Temple, Saturday evening, November 14.

Theo Karl Johnston, the young American tenor, is attracting much attention in the Pacific Northwest. He is just twenty-one years old and has already mastered seven operas, five of which he has sung on the stage, to say nothing of cantatas, oratorios, etc. He has so far this season sung fifteen recitals and at orchestral concerts, having appeared in the principal cities of the Northwest and in British Columbia. He is engaged to sing in "The Messiah" at Vancouver, B. C., during the holidays. His singing in "Pagliacci" with the Standard Grand Opera, last October, created a furore.

Hartford.

Hartford, Conn., December 10, 1914.

Hartford's energetic manager of musical affairs, George Kelley, announces the following artists in the World Famous Artists Series, to be held at Foot Guard Hall, January 26: Francis Macmillen and Tina Lerner; February 9, Evan Williams and Louis Siegel; March 9, Schumann-Heink and Edward McNamara; April 6, Alma Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist.

Gertrude Damon Fothergill, soprano; Nellie Carey Reynolds, contralto; Emma Spieske Miller, violinist; Philippe Lavasata, harpist, and Robert H. Prutting, organist, gave a delightful musicale in Weathersfield on December 2.

The Choral Club of Hartford gave the first concert of its eighth season last Monday evening, assisted by Anita Rio, soprano soloist. The program opened with the "Viking Song," Coleridge-Taylor, and in delightful contrast, the next number was "Echoes," music by Alfred E. Little. "The Whale," H. Jacobsen, was given with vim and enthusiasm, especially the last part which goes like this:

"The losing of that 'prentice boy,
It grieved our Captain sore;
But the losing of that great big whale,
It grieved him a d—— sight more."

Mme. Rio sang an aria from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and after many recalls she sang, in a very delightful manner, a French song, "To the Birds." The club followed with "Twilight," arranged by Homer B. Hatch, and "My Love Is Like the Red, Red Rose," Bantock, and the first part of the program was ended by "Spring Night," Max Filke. This number was by Mme. Rio. The club, the pianist and all parties performed their work very capably. The second part of the program began with a spirited performance of Charles S. Burnham's "Folly and I" and this was followed by two songs, "O Southland" and "Mother o' Mine," by H. T. Burleigh. In the latter song the club did some of the best work of the evening and both of these songs were given with a fine feeling of the emotional content. Mme. Rio sang two Neapolitan folksongs which were very pleasing, and the club sang "In the Woods with a Blackbird," A. von Othegraven, and "The Boog-a-boo," by Arthur Bergh. "Omnipotence," Frederick Stevenson, sung by Mme. Rio and the club, with piano, closed a very interesting program. The work of the conductor, Ralph L. Baldwin, always deserves unstinted praise and his control over and sympathy with his singers are remarkable. Another outstanding feature of the concert was the excellent work of Edward F. Laubin at the piano.

Laura Clark, violinist, and N. Val Peavey, pianist, gave a concert at Foot Guard Hall on December 8. The program included César Franck's A major sonata, Godard's "Concerto Romantique" and a group of smaller numbers. The pianist played selections from Bach, Beethoven, Chopin and concluded with the "Rigoletto" paraphrase.

H. D. PRENTICE.

Louisville.

Louisville, Ky., December 8, 1914.

The largest audience that ever assembled in this city at a recital greeted Ernestine Schumann-Heink last Wednesday night at the Masonic Theatre. The great contralto was in excellent condition, as gracious and smiling as ever, and was highly pleased with her welcome. Her program included excerpts from "Rheingold," "Götterdämmerung," "Tristan and Isolde," and "Tannhäuser"—a complete concert in itself. Besides these colossal offerings, she gave a group embracing Wagner's "Traume," Schubert's "Liebesbotschaft," "Der Erlkönig," "Die Forelle," Schumann's "Mondnacht" and an old German folksong, "Spinnerliedchen." Another group consisted of Gertrude Ross' "Dawn in the Desert," Arthur Foote's "Irish Folksong," Leroux's "The Nile," Edward Grieg's "The Mother Sings," and "Good Morning, Sue," by Delibes. In addition, several encores were accorded with her usual generosity. Edward J. McNamara, the assisting vocalist, revealed a baritone voice of pleasing quality. His selections were the "Pagliacci" prologue, Hastings' "Red, Red Rose," "The Auld Plaid Shawl," by Haynes, and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." His singing was well received by the audience. The superlatively beautiful accompaniments by Katharine Hoffmann were a feature of the performance. This is the first of three concerts to be given under the management of Harry Marx, the second being on January 13, when Evan Williams is to be the soloist.

The Louisville Male Chorus, a new organization under the direction of Carl Shackleton, gave with great success its first concert at the Woman's Club on the night of December 3, to a large audience of invited guests. The choral numbers were: "Winter Song," Bullard; "No Blade of Grass," W. F. Bach; "Thine," Carl Bohm; "All Through the Night"; "Mary," Richardson; "Cousin Jedidiah," Thompson; "When Love Is Done," Little; "Denny's Daughter," Huhn; "Oh, Press Thy Cheek," Jensen; "De Sandman," Protheroe, and "Hunting Song," Bullard. Arthur Almstedt, the club soloist for the occasion, surpassed himself in his rendition of "The Heart o' Ye," by Dichmont; "A Dinner Courtship," by Coates, and "Sea Wolves," by Stinstend. Mr. Almstedt's voice is a baritone of mellow power and considerable range, and his artistic interpretation of his numbers was highly appreciated. As an encore he sang "The Life Dream," a beautiful composition by Carl Shackleton, to which the composer played the accompaniment. The chorus accompaniments were played by Florence Blackman. It was announced that an associate membership would be organized, and, at the close of the performance, a large number of names were taken for that purpose. K. W. D.

Memphis.

Memphis, Tenn., December 15, 1914.

The Beethoven Club, with the praiseworthy object of cultivating the musical taste among the city's young folk, has organized a "Student Membership." Informal recitals will be given at different intervals, and members will be required to appear on one program during the season; the organization is entirely distinct from the Senior and Junior Membership, being composed of pupils from eighteen to twenty-four years of age. The Musical Culture Class is proving to be very attractive, the last meeting being in charge of Elizabeth Moshy, one of the leading piano teachers of Memphis. "Lohengrin" was chosen as the subject, which was prefaced by a short biographical sketch of the composer. Miss Mosby is a talented musician and received much praise for giving a most interesting talk. Illustrations used were by Gadski, Slezak and others.

A large and appreciative audience was in attendance at the second of the series of matinee concerts given at the Goodwyn Institute. The program, which was arranged by Hermine Taenzer, with Birdie Chamberlain as accompanist, follows: Piano, "Pony Race" (Friml), Mill May Maer; voice, "Obstination" (Fontennelle); prelude from "A Cycle of Life" (Landon Ronald), William Mitchell; voice, "Als die Alte Mutter" (Dvorák), "How Much I Love You" (La Forge), "Love Has Wings" (Rogers), Mrs. F. Faehrmann; piano, prelude (Rachmaninoff), "Whispering Wind" (Wollenhaupt), Mrs. Stanley Simon; "Sogno d'Amor" (Gregh), "Little Boy Blue" (Joyce), Emma Jones Worman; "Rigoletto" (Liszt), Miss Maer; "Mother o' Mine" (Tours), "Nirvana" (Adams), recitative and aria, "With All Your Hearts," from "Elijah" (Mendelssohn), Mr. Mitchell.

Distance of Sound.

Does the bellowing of thunder carry further than the roar of cannon? Some of us to whom thunder and lightning are a joy may often have amused ourselves by counting the seconds between the flash and the sound, with the idea of estimating the distance of the disturbance. The furthest distance ever estimated on this basis—the time taken by sound to travel—of the distant source of thunder is fifteen miles, a mere trifle to the accomplishments of the cannon.

Artillery can make its voice easily audible thirty miles off. During the siege of Paris, Krupp's guns could be heard at Dieppe, ninety miles away. Arago vouches for the story that the cannonading at Waterloo was heard at a distance of 125 miles.—London Chronicle.

VOL. LXIX.—NO. 26. NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1914. WHOLE NO. 1814.

CHICAGO HAS A BUSY WEEK.

Conductor Stock Presents Delightful Program —Numerous Recitals Given.

MUSIC OF CHICAGO COMPOSERS HEARD.

Chicago, Ill., December 24, 1914.

CHICAGO SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Frederick Stock, presented at its weekly pair of concerts on Friday afternoon, December 25, and Saturday evening, December 26, the pastorale from "Christmas" oratorio, by Bach; the Mendelssohn overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; the Schubert symphony, No. 8, B minor (unfinished); Weber-Weingartner's "Invitation to the Dance"; Klose's "Elfenreigen; the Grainger two dances, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." The soloist was Enrico Tramonti, harpist of the orchestra, who played the concerto for harp by Reinicke.

Mr. Green shared with his colleagues in the success of the afternoon. He is justly considered Chicago's best basso, and has a claim to this undisputed title. His group consisted of two songs by Clara Schumann, "Ich stand in dunklen Traumen" and "Liebst du um Schonheit"; Robert Schumann's "Wenn ich in deine Augen seh"; Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes aus der Natur"; Coerne's "Mystery"; "The Argosy," by Alexander Hull, and two songs by John Alden Carpenter, "The Day Is No More" and "Don't Ceare." Mr. Green disclosed to best advantage in each number his sonorous, beautifully placed voice, and he sang with telling effect, intelligence and taste. His interpretations were excellent and his diction of the German and English most commendable.

SPENCER-GUNN-GREEN RECITAL.

At the Fine Arts Theatre last Sunday afternoon, December 19, before a large and enthusiastic audience, Allen Spencer and Glenn Dillard Gunn gave a two piano recital. They were assisted by Marion Green, bass. Messrs. Spencer and Gunn had arranged a program containing several novelties, among them being Alkan's "Benedictus," which had its first performance in Chicago, and also the Ravel introduction and allegro. Two other numbers were the Saint-Saëns' variations on theme by Beethoven and Chabrier's "Caprice Espagnole." Each pianist should be accorded individual praise for exceptionally good readings of the works. They displayed musicianship and pianistic ability of the first order. Both artists drew from their instruments a beautiful tone and so well blended was their playing that at times it seemed as if only one person sat at the keyboard. Mr. Gunn and Mr. Spencer are splendidly equipped technically and temperamentally. They performed remarkable feats of technic in the Chabrier number.

MUSIC OF CHICAGO COMPOSERS PRESENTED.

A program of music by Chicago composers was presented at Fullerton Hall on Tuesday evening by the Society of American Musicians. Among those who appeared may be mentioned Albert Lindquist, tenor, who sang a group of five songs by Louis Adolf Coerne; Messrs. Stoeber and Leo Sowerby, who played eight little pieces for piano and cello by Mr. Sowerby and Hugo Kortschak; George Dasch and Emmeran Stoeber played the terzetto for violin, viola and cello by Eric de Lamarter.

VIOLET BOURNE'S RECITAL.

At the Bush Conservatory Recital Hall on Friday evening, December 11, Violet Bourne, known as the wonderful child pianist, and pupil of Julie Rive-King, was heard in the prelude and fugue by Haberbier-Guilmant-Rive-King, the Haydn sonata No. 7 and the Chopin etude op. 7, No. 10. She also was heard in smaller pieces by Cyril Scott, Debussy, Liszt and played the MacDowell concerto, No. 1 with Mme. Rive-King at the second piano. Violet Bourne, who is only twelve years old, does not exactly belong in the category of "wunderkind." Though she is not as yet a mature artist, she has made big progress since heard, when only nine years old, at a recital given by the Bush Conservatory. She has been well schooled and will probably some day be reckoned among the leading feminine pianists of the world.

Miss Bourne could have earned much money on the vaudeville stage, having several years ago received a very tempting offer, but her wise mother thought best to place her in the hands of Mme. Rive-King. Her success at this concert was as big as it was deserved. Claire Hart, tenor, was heard in an aria from "Pagliacci" and a group of songs by Handel, Clark and Leoni. Mr. Hart, who is a pupil of David Baxter, showed the result of good training and disclosed a voice of sweet and agreeable quality.

MINNEAPOLIS NEWS.

Two Attractive Programs by Symphony Orchestra —Violinist Replaces Cellist as Soloist Owing to Accident to Finger of Latter—Thursday Musical Program—Emil Oberhoffer Arranges MacDowell "Woodland Sketches" for Orchestra.

At the regular Friday evening concert of December 18, the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra again presented the Rachmaninoff E minor symphony op. 27. This was played last season and met with so much appreciation that it was repeated on this program. Like so much Russian music, the tinge of Oriental characteristics creeps imperceptibly in. All four movements seem to be the work of inspiration. The adagio is full of lingering sweetness, while the allegro vivace revels in Rachmaninoff's favorite peculiarities of rhythm and each movement occasionally broadens out into the triumphant broad themes suggestive of the Russian hymn.

The symphony was preceded by the Rimsky-Korsakow overture to "A Night in May" which prepared the listeners for their enjoyment of Rachmaninoff.

A large audience was in attendance, and all regretted the slight accident to his little finger which prevented Cornelius Van Vliet from appearing as soloist. As leader of the cellos Mr. Van Vliet has won many devoted admirers, and his solo appearances on the Friday evening programs have each year added to his conquests. Mr. Van Vliet played through the Rachmaninoff symphony, but the injured finger grew so troublesome that he was unable to appear after the intermission, and Richard Czerwonky took his place as soloist on five minutes' notice, playing what Mr. Czerwonky had expected to perform on the Sunday program following, the D minor violin concerto of Bruch. The audience proved its loyalty to both soloists by the regrets expressed on every side at Mr. Van Vliet's non-appearance and the genuine admiration for Mr. Czerwonky in so successfully meeting the emergency, even to the playing of a delightful encore.

The program closed with Scheinpflug's delightful overture to a "Comedy of Shakespeare."

THURSDAY MUSICAL CLUB PROGRAM.

The last program of the year 1914 was given by the Thursday Musical Club on the afternoon of December 17 at the First Baptist Church. The attraction of this meeting was the appearance of the Thursday Musical Choral Club under the direction of H. S. Woodruff. They sang three times and the numbers showed marked improvement and much serious study. "A Christmas Greeting," by Elgar, was splendidly sung to the accompaniment of four violins. "The Auld House," by Moffett; "Bitter for Sweet," by Horrocks; "Oh Lift Your Heads Who Feareth," from the Cologne psalter (a seventeenth century carol), and "Snow," by Elgar, completed the choral club numbers.

"Romance," by Hellmesberger, was finely played by four violinists—Misses Winifred Lind, Arline Folsom, Marion Baernstein and Blanche Sheffield. The Misses Lind and Sheffield were received into the club only a week ago and great interest was shown in their first public appearance. Miss Lind is the gifted daughter of the well known statesman, John Lind. Mrs. Vena Gibson-Garnum played the Gluck-Brahms "Gavotte" and the Chopin waltz op. 42. No. 1. She is a good pianist and her interpretations on this occasion were excellent.

The chief interest of the popular program given by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra at the auditorium, Sunday afternoon, December 20, centered in the orchestral setting by Conductor Emil Oberhoffer of MacDowell's "Woodland Sketches." On former occasions we have admired the clever arrangements of Mr. Oberhoffer, but this time he quite surpassed his former efforts. His conscientious study of the beloved American composer has given him so deep an insight into MacDowell that these were real character translations. The six sketches which Mr. Oberhoffer arranged were "In Autumn," "To a Wild Rose," "From Uncle Remus," "At an Old Trysting Place," "To a Water Lily" and "Told at Sunset." The "Festival" march from "Tannhäuser," and the overture from the same opera were followed by Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony. Strauss' waltz "Tales from Vienna Woods" concluded a beautifully arranged program.

The soloist of the day was the concertmaster Richard Czerwonky who played the Bruch D minor concerto. Mr. Czerwonky is popular and justly so for his playing is a joy to hear. His delightful rendition of this concerto brought forth such thunderous applause that he was forced to respond to two recalls—first his own clever arrangement of a Weber waltz, and Simonetti's "Madrigal."

RUTH ANDERSON.

BALTIMORE EVENTS.

213 Prospect Avenue, Roland Park,
Baltimore, Md., December 22, 1914.

Baltimoreans were fortunate in hearing a whole recital program by Fritz Keisler, his second appearance this season in America. Mr. Keisler surpassed himself, and awoke a frenzy of enthusiasm in his audience, which demanded encore after encore.

ARUNDELL CLUB MUSICALE.

The December musicale of the Arundell Club was a piano recital by Marguerite Maas, who gave a Chopin program, consisting of the B flat minor sonata, the three waltzes of op. 64, three etudes, the C sharp minor, fantasie, impromptu, and the polonaise, op. 40, No. 1.

GUSTAV STRUBE'S ACTIVITIES.

In addition to his usual work at the conservatory with which he is connected, Gustav Strube has been conducting a Students' Orchestra. His experienced leadership has worked wonders with this body of young musicians, and their first concert of this season was most enjoyable. Mr. Strube's own composition, "Mirage," a suite for children which abounds in grace and spirit and most interesting harmonies, was delightfully played. Emily Diver, soprano, and Taylor Scott, baritone, were the soloists.

MELAMET OPERA CLASS.

The second concert of the Melamet Opera Class was somewhat curtailed by the ravages of laryngitis among several of the singers; but it was an offering of real interest in spite of discouraging conditions. Ida Shaw, soprano, and George Pickering, tenor, sang well in two duets. Henschel's "Oh That We Two Were Maying" and "The Passage Bird's Farewell," by Hildach. Adele Schaefer, contralto, did some beautiful work in the "Ah, se tu dormi" aria from Vaccai's "Giuletta e Romeo," and responded to the applause with a serenade by Mokrejs. Other soloists were Clarence R. Tucker, whose tenor voice was heard to advantage in the quintet from "Die Meistersinger," as was also the bass of R. Fuller Fleet; John F. Osbourn, baritone, and Else Melamet, contralto, the talented daughter of the teacher who inspires and directs all the public appearances of the class which bears his name. Mrs. Melamet played her usual delightful accompaniments.

PHILADELPHIA SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra scored a great success in a concert at the Lyric last Wednesday, at which Mme. Schumann-Heink was the soloist. Leopold Stokowski has made a profound impression on the Baltimore public, as was attested by the warmth of this conductor's reception at this concert. Mme. Schumann-Heink sang with all of her customary authority; her voice was beautiful as always.

PUPILS' RECITAL.

Adele Meade, violinist, presented a number of her pupils in a recital program at Lehmann's Hall, Friday night. Miss Meade studied with Joachim during the last year of his life, and subsequently with Barmas, whose method of tuition she follows. Elizabeth Duncan, soprano, assisted.

CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENT.

For the Christmas treat given to poor children by the Empty Stocking Club, the Musical Union has donated the services of a large concert band. Four hundred vested choristers will, in addition, sing carols. D. L. F.

Willard Flint's Chicago Tributes.

Willard Flint, the Boston basso, recently completed a very successful concert tour of short duration in the middle West. Mr. Flint, who is also a prominent figure in the Boston teaching fraternity, won considerable merited praise for his artistic performances while on this tour, and herewith are reproduced a few of the criticisms of his Chicago recital at the Fine Arts Theatre on December 6:

Mr. Flint disclosed not only a voice of pleasurable quality, but effective understanding how it should be used. He is known to audiences in the East as a singer of oratorio, but the results of his efforts at this concert proved that Mr. Flint has in him the making of an excellent interpreter of songs. His clear enunciation was not the least of his artistic merits.—Chicago Herald, December 8, 1914.

Methods which denote intellectuality and artistic feeling characterized the recital which Willard Flint, the Boston basso cantante, presented at the Fine Arts Theatre yesterday afternoon.

He gave a fine rendition of Handel's "O Ruddier than the Cherry," his voice showing resonance, flexibility and range, and his reading of Schumann's "Ich Grolle Nicht" was also artistic, and Mallinson's "Neujahrslied" proved interesting.—Chicago Examiner, December 7, 1914.

Mr. Flint is an excellent singer of songs, with a voice of mellow quality which has been well schooled. His singing of the Handel aria was broad and solid and all that he did was with appreciation.—Chicago Evening Post, December 7, 1914.

The Handel aria, "O Ruddier than the Cherry," with which he began, was very pleasingly sung, with a nice understanding of the music and a sympathetic voice, flexible and strong.—Chicago Daily News, December 7, 1914.

Mr. Flint's voice is extraordinarily grateful in quality. "At Last the Bounteous Sun with Joy to Impatient Husbandmen," from Haydn's "Seasons," he sang with a kind of homely exultation and with technical adequacy.—Chicago Tribune, December 7, 1914.

The afternoon performance in the Fine Arts disclosed some very good singing. Flint is stated to have put much of his artistic activity into oratorio. This would account for his excellent rendition of Handel's tricky aria, "O Ruddier than the Cherry." In the more restrained songs following he produced an impression of a man with a fine voice who enjoys singing. His voice is very good in its medium and low range. His enunciation is remarkably clear.—Chicago Journal, December 7, 1914.

Mr. Flint is a singer in whom vocal talent and musical intellectuality balance each other beautifully. In his recitals he strives less for outer effect than interpretation from within. Moreover, the artist's pronunciation of German was perfect. Mr. Flint made a great impression by his masterful application of mezzo voce; his organ seems to have undergone a thorough process of development and training. He gave his best in Handel's aria "O Ruddier than the Cherry," the difficult coloratures of which came out with admirable ease and clearness. A "Neujahrslied," by Mallinson, sung in German, full of charming melody, was extremely delightful.—Daily Illinois Staatszeitung, Monday, December 7, 1914.

Marie Kaiser, a Busy Singer.

Marie Kaiser recently sang Horatio Parker's "St. Christopher" at Worcester, Mass., with a large chorus under the direction of Mr. Butler. Last week she sang in Hoboken, N. J., and Tuesday night she was heard in "The Messiah" at Jersey City, the other soloists being Christine Schutz, contralto; William H. Pagdin, tenor, and Edmund Jahn, basso. Miss Kaiser leaves this week for Kansas City, where she appears in Convention Hall for the benefit of the Red Cross of that city, on the same program with Alice Nielsen. She was the soloist recently with the Orpheus Club, of Paterson, N. J., under the direction of C. Mortimer Wiske, winning instant success.

Demand for Pittsburgh Soprano.

May Marshall Cobb, soprano, has been busy filling engagements in Pittsburgh, her home city, and various parts of Pennsylvania and Ohio. Among her most important appearances since October 1 may be mentioned recitals at Rochester, Pa., October 1; with the Pittsburgh Athletic Association, October 4; before the convention of the Pennsylvania Federation of Women's Clubs, October 6; at a private musicale in Buffalo, October 20; at a concert under the auspices of the Shadyside United Presbyterian Church of Pittsburgh, November 6; before the bankers' meeting at the Hotel Schenley, Pittsburgh, November 16; at Dixmont, Pa., November 20; before the Pittsburgh Athletic Association, December 6; at Butler, Pa., December 11; in "The Messiah" at Wooster, Ohio, December 15; before the Twentieth Century Club of Pittsburgh, December 16; at a musicale in Pittsburgh, December 17.

Following her appearance at Butler, Pa., the Butler Eagle spoke of "her remarkable range and the texture, tone quality, and expression" of her voice. And this opinion has been shared by the critics in all those places where she has sung.

MAY MARSHALL COBB.

For the month of January, 1915, she has already been booked for appearances at Pittsburgh, McKeesport, Donora, and Sharon in Pennsylvania, and at Cleveland, Ohio.

Charles W. Clark Sings at Blackstone Hotel

On December 17 Charles W. Clark, the baritone, gave a program before a distinguished company of music lovers at the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago, entertained by Mrs. Keith Spaulding. Mr. Clark had to grant many encores, and his recital was most satisfactory.

The program was as follows: "Prologue," Leoncavallo; "Les Cloches," "Mandoline," Debussy; "L'Heure Exquise," Hahn; "Vision Fugitive," Massenet; "Aus Meinen Grossen Schmerzen," "Es hat die Rose Sich Beklagt," Franz; "Der Sandtrager," Bungert; "Recompense," Hammond; "Uncle Rome," Homer; "The Eagle," Busch.

Gordon Campbell accompanied at the piano.

Katharine Goodson to Arrive January 3.

Katharine Goodson had planned to sail from Liverpool on the steamer Cedric, December 16, but as this boat has been requisitioned by the British Government for military purposes, she has now arranged to leave ten days later on the Cunard steamer Franconia, which is due to arrive in New York on January 3. Her opening dates will be as follows: January 8, Auburn, N. Y.; January 11, Wells College, Aurora, N. Y.; January 12, Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.; January 15, Brooklyn; January 18, Chicago.

Helen Ware in the South.

Helen Ware's appearance in Macon, Ga marks the end of her Southern tour. From Minnesota to Texas and then through the South, Helen Ware played a chain of concerts: In Kenosha, Wis., a joint recital with Bauer; Chicago; Holland, Mich; Mankato, Minn; joint recital with Ganz; Emporia, Kan., joint recital with Fannie Bloomfield Zeisler; Houston and Victoria in Texas, etc.

The Macon concert, as did nearly all the other appearances, resulted in a re-engagement, attesting to the popularity of Helen Ware's Hungarian and Slavic recitals.

The music lovers of Macon had been looking forward with expectation to the music of the Magyars and Slavs, and they are said to have been roused to a high pitch of enthusiasm by Helen Ware's rendition of her unique program.

Professor Maerz at the piano gave the violinist such capable support that she felt as much at ease with her program as though she had her regular accompanist.

In the Goldmark suite for violin and piano the two artists gave a splendid reading to the lyric passages of this work of the Hungarian composer.

In her Hungarian and Slav numbers, Helen Ware proved to be an artist worthy of the adjectives: "Most powerful and poetic."

The ovation tendered by her audience reached its zenith when she played her own arrangement of a Hungarian love song. After persistent applause the number had to be repeated. But the "Camp of fiddlers" did not even then seem satisfied with the second performance of this gem for they crowded about her as she was about to leave the hall, begging for its third rendition anxious to hear once again the haunting melody that ends in a difficult arrangement of double harmonics. Miss Ware promised to play it again the next time she visited Macon.

Concert at Keyser, W. Va.

An interesting concert was given in the school auditorium of the preparatory branch of the West Virginia University, Keyser, W. Va. on Tuesday evening, December 15, when the following program was presented: Prelude (Rachmaninoff), "Masquerade Dance" (Hopkins), "Saxonne" (Godard), Miss Hoffman; "Should He Upbraid" (Bishop), "The Loreley" (Liszt), Miss Grimes; "Invictus" (Huhn), "Night and Dawn" (Liddle), "I Know a Lovely Garden" (D'Hardelot), "O' du mein holder Abendstern" from "Tannhauser" (Wagner), Mr. Schiffeler; "Query" (MacDermid), "Concert Etude" (MacDowell), Miss Hoffman; "Somewhere a Voice is Calling" (Tate), "Carissima" (Gomez), "Ashes of Roses" (Woodman). "Italian Street Song" (Herbert), Miss Grimes; "Il Trovatore" (Verdi), "Mother o' Mine" (Tours), "Good-bye" (Tosti), Mr. Schiffeler.

Elsie Hoffman, who has charge of the piano department at this institution, gave intelligent readings of her numbers, the composition by MacDermid, "Query," being especially enjoyed. She has a fluent technic and rare talent. Helen Grimes, soprano, has an excellent voice which she uses with intelligence.

Carl Schiffeler, baritone, opened his part of the program with a spirited rendering of Bruno Huhn's "Invictus." His other songs were on a par with the beautiful Huhn number.

Students at this school, as well as the townspeople, are fortunate in having three such excellent artists residing in their midst.

Florence Larrabee Complimented.

Max Fiedler, when conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, paid a striking compliment to American talent by engaging Florence Larrabee, as a soloist. Having heard the young pianist play in the studio of her teacher Carl Stasny, Mr. Fiedler asked about her future plans. She said she proposed teaching. "But you are ready for the concert platform now," said the conductor, and to emphasize his opinion engaged her on the spot to play MacDowell's second concerto with the Boston Orchestra.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

Alexander Bloch's Newport Notices.

A large and fine audience had a season of rich and pure enjoyment at Masonic Hall Thursday evening. It was the twenty-third concert by the Philharmonic Society, the artists being Alexander Bloch, violin, and Blanche Bloch, piano, and it was one of those unusual events where the performers were wholly carried away with ideal music, which, for something like two hours, was given without dross or alloy—just noble, pure music. The people at times were almost breathless, some craning their necks for long periods, that their eyes might try to aid their ears in catching every possible bit of such delight. It was playing which is made up of a never ending succession of pleasant surprises, yet all perfectly natural. There was fine technic, sufficient for any requirement; but it was so mastered that it was well nigh forgotten altogether by players and hearers.

For the most part the music was full of "expression" of the most delicate sort; more than that, it was full of soul. Yet, where fire and spirit were called for, there was plenty. There was a constant "shading," not only of the usual sort but also of the tempo, and it was in no case overdone. There was a masterly understanding and an absolute certainty in carrying it into execution. The music seemed to permeate and sway the whole bodies of the players. These appear to be young people; one wonders what they will be after a few more years of this rare sort of study and work.

The Beethoven sonata for violin and piano (op. 96, in G) was a delightful treat. Rarely has there been such masterly playing in this city. Every movement and every little phrase was given its full value and true interpretation. The "ensemble" was perfect in every detail, and the two players were so completely in sympathy that they were really one; yet each was doing beautiful work. The violin was a wonder for great volume, beauty and purity of tone. The sympathetic quality was there, too. There was never a least suggestion of being in a hurry, yet when speed was the proper thing there was abundance of it. These players have a right to play Beethoven, and everybody was in bliss while hearing them. There was a recall, but no encores were given.

All the violin numbers were delightful, and so was the accompanying. The G string proved to be fine, there was rare work in "harmonics," the "attack" was splendid, so was the technic. All the selections were much appreciated and applauded, the last bringing out a perfect burst, which was acknowledged by Mr. Bloch's returning to bow his appreciation.—Newport (R. I.) News, December 11, 1914.

For the second concert of this season the Philharmonic Society offered Alexander Bloch, violinist, and Belle Bloch, pianist, in a varied and excellent program. For ensemble numbers Beethoven's sonata in G major, op. 96, and a chaconne by Vitali, a composer of the sixteenth century, were played.

To speak first of the ensemble work, never probably have there been heard in Newport two players who seemed more closely "en rapport." If the performance had had no other merit this would have made it acceptable, but when one comes to add that the musical intuition of both players is developed in a very marked degree it can be better conceived how delightful the players became. And the same thing was clearly apparent when Mr. Bloch was playing his solos and Miss Bloch was accompanying. Really fine accompaniment is a rare accomplishment, and Miss Bloch possesses it, and in full measure.

Mr. Bloch's playing is beautiful not alone in tone quality, for which he deserves great praise, but also in style. His bowing is always graceful and his whole performance has a quality of what may be called elegance for want of a better word. His technic is entirely adequate and he has plenty of fire and force when they are needed.

He is a very fine violinist.

Miss Bloch is an excellent pianist. It is somewhat to be regretted that nearly all her selections ("Lithanisches Lied" by Chopin-Auer, a Serenata Napolitana by Sgambati, and the Brahms-Joachim "Hungarian Dance" No. 7 in G minor; in the second group was the Albumhlatt by Wagner-Wilhelmj and Wieniawski's polonaise in D major) were of the bravura style of composition so frequently played by soloists, but not for that reason to be desired to the exclusion of some more quiet pieces, which would have given the pleasure of hearing Miss Bloch's smooth, legato free touch, which was evident in her work with Mr. Bloch. She has such command of piano technic that it was regretted that most of that displayed in her solos was of the forceful and brilliant rather than that of the more subtle kind.

Both the players were called again and again to the platform after their numbers, and it was evident that they may come to Newport again and receive a very warm welcome.—Newport (R. I.) Herald, December 11, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Prominent Singers in Gilberté's Songs.

Hardly a day passes in the offices of the MUSICAL COURIER without the arrival of programs from various states, Maine to California, with Hallet Gilberté's name on them. His songs are constantly sung by leading soloists. The foreign singers, too, are taking up his compositions. Among recent interpreters are Florence Mulford Hunt, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who is featuring his dramatic song, "Ah, Love, but a Day," on all her programs. Vera Courtenay, prima donna of the Opera Comique, Paris, is making a great success singing his "Song of the Canoe," "Minuet la Phyllis," and "Ah, Love, but a Day," at all her concerts. William Simmons, the rising young baritone, is making marked success with "Forever and a Day," "My Lady's Mirror," and "An Evening Song." Eva Mylott, contralto, has sung his exquisite song, "Two Roses," over one hundred times. Vernon Archibald, the well known baritone, makes a tremendous success with the "Minuet la Phyllis" and "Forever and a Day," generally being obliged to repeat these songs before his audiences will allow him to continue. Nina Dimitrieff, the Russian prima donna, has added his three latest publications, "An Evening Song," "The Little Red Ribbon," and the "Song of the Canoe" to her repertoire. John Finnegan, the Irish tenor, has sung Gilberté's "Ah, Love, but a Day" from Maine to California.

Others using Gilberté's songs with great success may be mentioned: Evan Williams, Myrna Sharlow, Mme. Buckhout, Florence Anderson Otis, Beatrice McCue, Ethylndc Smith, Bertha Barnes, Harold Fowler, Isabel Thrope, also Carl Rupprecht and Edna Wolverton, two of Claude Warford's artist-pupils.

DETROIT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS VARIED PROGRAM.

Second Concert Pleases Large Audience—Orpheus Club Concert—A Carol Service.

Detroit, Mich., December 19, 1914.

The second concert of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Weston Gales, conductor, was given in the Detroit Opera House, Thursday afternoon, December 17, at 4 o'clock. The program included the Brahms symphony, No. 1, in C minor, "Valse Triste," Sibelius, and Vorspiel, "Haensel and Gretel," Humperdinck. The orchestra fulfilled the expectations aroused at the first concert, as was manifested by the sincere applause and the general expressions of approval heard on all sides. Mr. Gales succeeds in making his men a unit, no little task in the short time they have been with him. There was little to criticize and much to praise. The audience manifested its appreciation in no uncertain way at the close of the lovely second movement of the symphony. The Detroit Orchestra plays with a rhythmic precision that is most satisfying and presents definite tone pictures despite occasional crudities of tone quality. The next concert will be given January 21.

ORPHEUS CLUB CONCERT.

Friday evening, December 11, the Orpheus Club, a male chorus of twenty-five voices under the direction of Charles Frederic Morse, gave a delightful concert before its sustaining members at the Westminster Church. A group of part songs by Elgar proved to be of unusual interest, and "From the Sea" by MacDowell, a great success of last season, was repeated by request. The assisting artist was Florence Hinkle, who sang "Depuis le jour" from "Louise" and two groups of songs also a solo obligato in "O, Earth, thou art fair" by Dregert. Miss Hinkle is an artist whom one hears with pleasure for her work is marked by temperament and intelligence. She has appeared in Detroit before and added many to her list of admirers here by her beautiful work at this concert.

CAROL SERVICE BY STATE NORMAL CHOIR.

A most unusual service was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, Sunday evening, December 13, when the State Normal choir from Ypsilanti, under the direction of Frederick Alexander gave a program of Christmas carols. The choir is of superlative excellence. The two hundred voices are young and fresh; attendance upon rehearsals is obligatory. This combined with the fact that Mr. Alexander is a most capable director results in a body of singers that can demonstrate the possibilities of choral work in all illuminating manner. JENNIE M. STODDARD.

Miss Gailey Will Christmas Down South.

Because of her many engagements, requiring her presence in the South both immediately before and after Christmas, Mary Gailey, the talented young violinist, has decided to remain in that section of the country, spending her short vacation in Mobile, Ala., and New Orleans. Miss Gailey has been appearing before numerous colleges and schools where she is a prime favorite, many of her engagements being return appearances. Some of these are: Anderson College, Parks Collegiate Institute, Benton Parker College, etc. Miss Gailey already has a number of engagements booked in the New England states for next year.

Sergei Klibansky's Studio Musicale.

On Wednesday, December 16, Sergei Klibansky gave a studio musicale at which Mildred Ingersoll, Grace Jones, Virginia Magruder, Arabelle Warefield, Lalla Cannon, Jean Vincent Cooper and Valeska Wagner sang. Miss Cooper was engaged to sing at the Vanderbilt Hotel, December 29. Mr. Klibansky's next artist-pupils' recital will occur Saturday, January 30, in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A., West Fifty-seventh street, New York.

Mr. Klibansky left for the Adirondacks, December 24, for a needed Christmas vacation. He resumes teaching January 4.

Wager Swayne Pupil Wins Success.

Omaha people may well feel proud to claim Marie Mikova, the talented young pianist, as one of her own daughters. Miss Mikova recently returned to Omaha after your years' study with Wager Swayne in Paris, and made her debut as a concert pianist at a most delightful recital Tuesday evening at the First Baptist Church, before a large and enthusiastic audience of music lovers and friends.

Miss Mikova revealed great strength, temperament in abundance, and the musicianship and intellect to make her interpretations at all times interesting. As she plays her beloved instrument she presents a fascinating picture, being unusually graceful.

The program opened with the Beethoven sonata in three movements, which was brilliantly played, the melodies and rhythmic effects being beautifully brought out. The next group consisted of five Chopin etudes and waltzes, abounding in beautiful crystalline runs and rhythmic and tonal effects, revealing to the fullest her complete mastery of the piano. A sonatine by Ravel proved interesting and pleasing and was followed by a nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream," with its beautiful melody; a scherzo by Mendelssohn, brilliantly rendered; a Weber rondo, with its joyous swing and intricate passage work, and the Chopin polonaise, op. 53, which was given in magnificent style, revealing to the greatest advantage her great power and brilliant technic. Miss Mikova was received with the greatest applause, but responded to only one encore, giving the Schubert-Liszt "Erlking." She was the recipient of many beautiful floral tributes.—Omaha Examiner.

A very representative and enthusiastic audience greeted Marie Mikova, who gave her first piano recital since leaving Omaha four years ago to continue her study under Wager-Swayne in Paris, Tuesday evening at the First Baptist Church. Miss Mikova possesses remarkable technical ability and an abundance of temperament and plays with such life and enthusiasm that her work is a delight at all times, whether it be the more brilliant passages which she handles with such skill or the delicate pianissimos, equally artistic. The young artist's rendering of the Beethoven sonata, op. 57, which opened the program, was really masterful and brought out to the fullest the rare beauty and melody of the selection. The Chopin numbers, which followed, were veritable gems, particularly the two waltzes, which were full of brilliant passages and lilting melody. The sonatine by Ravel was most enjoyable and again showed the pianist's versatility and interpretive ability. The nocturne by Mendelssohn-Smith, was another exquisite selection, a lovely melody, which was given very artistically. The rondo brilliant, by Weber, was one of the most delightful numbers of the program, and the polonaise, op. 53, which closed the program, was so well liked that the audience insisted upon an encore, to which Miss Mikova responded with the Schubert-Liszt "Erlking."—The Omaha Excelsior. Saenger Musical Tea.

An exceptionally fine program was presented at the December Musical Tea at Oscar Saenger's studio, New York. Among his pupils who took part were: Queena Tillotson, soprano; Albert Wiederhold, basso; Milton Bernhard, baritone and Marie von Essen, contralto.

A large assemblage was present. The Saenger Musical Teas are an excellent means for the commingling of his amateur and professional pupils and many of his students have received engagements from the opportunities presented on these occasions.

The Band of Hope was singing a well known temperance hymn, "My drink is water bright," and singing it in a very dull and lifeless fashion. "Come, come, children, wake up!" cried the curate energetically. "Come, now, 'My drink is water bright,' and do, please, put a little spirit in it."—Otago Witness, Dunedin, N. Z.

LOS ANGELES PHILHARMONIC COURSE IS MERITORIOUS.

Each Event Has Been One of Unusual Interest—Gamut Club Dinner—A Gifted Local Composer—Noted Tenor in Recital—Italian Violinist Heard for First Time in Los Angeles.

1110 W. Washington Street,
Los Angeles, Cal., December 12, 1914.

I feel moved to speak again of the fine list of musical attractions that L. E. Behymer has arranged for his Philharmonic Courses this season. Each event so far has been one of unusual interest and worth, and the opportunity of hearing these concerts should be valued by all who find pleasure in the best music. This past week has brought Evan Williams, the Welsh-American tenor, and Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist.

Evan Williams Opens Matinee Series.

Evan Williams opened the Matinee Series of concerts November 28, but was suffering from a severe cold and feeling that he had not done himself justice, he and Mr. Behymer arranged to repeat the concert on Friday evening, December 11. Another crowded house greeted the singer and listened spellbound through a trying program. Mr. Williams is past master in depicting the range of human emotions and his beautiful voice is capable of many colors. This, together with his intense feeling and grasp, gives him the power to move deeply his audiences. He was obliged to respond to many encores, sometimes singing two or three, all of them requests. His son, Vernon Williams, is his accompanist and close companion. Mr. Williams will always be a welcome guest in Los Angeles.

Gamut Club Dinner.

Wednesday evening, December 2, was the date of the monthly dinner of the Gamut Club and many guests were present. It was a very happy evening. Among the distinguished guests were Evan Williams, Vernon Williams, Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Bendix, Miss Honiss, leading woman of "The Whip" company and several of her assistants, The Davis Family, late of Kansas City, Francis J. Tyler of the Savage Company, Kassa Bailey of Santa Ana. The local guests were Mrs. C. S. Delano and her wire-stringed quartet, Ray Crittenden, Thomas Govan and Jane Catherwood.

Mr. Williams was kind enough to sing and other musical numbers were given by Mr. Tyler, The Davis Family, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Govan and Mrs. Delano and quartet.

GERTRUDE ROSS,
The talented young composer of Los Angeles, whose "Three Songs of the Desert" are being sung by Mme. Schumann-Heink, Mme. Gérville-Reache and other prominent artists.

Mr. Bendix made a very witty speech and Mr. Williams also addressed the company briefly.

Arrico Serato in Violin Recital.

Arrigo Serato gave a recital on Tuesday evening, December 8, and pleased greatly. Serato has something all his own, entirely individual. His appearance was a veritable triumph. Homer Samuels at the piano was a worthy support to the artist. Serato's program had few novelties, but the old favorites took on an entirely new meaning under his magical touch.

Gertrude Ross' Compositions.

Gertrude Ross, the talented local composer, is preparing some new manuscripts which have been accepted by the White-Smith Company and will be out in the near future. Mrs. Ross and Grace Widney Mabee have been much in demand for various clubs and schools this season and on each program Mrs. Mabee has sung a number of Mrs. Ross' compositions with marked success. The latest program was the one given for the Coleman House Benefit Concert at the Ebell Club House on Thursday night. A number of the leading artists are using Mrs. Ross' "Desert Suite," or "Three Songs of the Desert," on their programs this season, and she is the recipient of many letters of commendation and congratulations. Rudolph Ganz, on his recent visit here, expressed himself as much pleased with these numbers.

Mrs. Catherwood Entertains.

Mrs. Catherwood's monthly reception at the Fowler, Monday evening, November 30, was largely attended. An informal program was given by two young and promising musicians. Marjorie Nichols, pianist and pupil of J. A. Anderson, has been spoken of a number of times already in these columns. She is rapidly approaching the artist class, although but little past eighteen. She has already appeared this season with the Woman's Symphony Orchestra and is to appear with the San Diego Orchestra later in the season, and has a number of other important engagements pending. Her work is brilliant and satisfying. Katherine Melville, a young singer, and a pupil of Mrs. Louis Sterne, is possessed of a pleasing soprano voice of much sweetness and gives promise of accomplishing a musical future. Mrs. Hepburn accompanied Miss Melville most efficiently.

May MacDonald-Hope Piano Recital.

May MacDonald-Hope is another of the young and talented musicians of Los Angeles who has won laurels abroad. She has recently returned from Europe and gave a recital in the Ebell Club House last night. I was unable to hear this program, but every one speaks of her as a very gifted pianist.

Ferguson Vance and His Pupils.

Edgar Ferguson Vance, the Lamperti exponent here and graduate of the Giulia Valda School of Singing in Paris, is rapidly becoming established as one of the leading teachers of voice. He has a large class, the majority of whom are professionals, and is about to establish a class in opera, which will be most helpful. One of his professional pupils, Mrs. Edward H. Whitehorn, has been in demand this fall for recitals and has recently given programs in Glendora, Hollywood and Los Angeles.

Mrs. Kinney Here.

Mrs. Eugene Kinney, of Denver, president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, has been in this city some time arranging for the 1915 biennial and festival, and holding consultations with President Blanchard and the members of the American Operatic Association.

Jane Catherwood.

Philadelphia Club Re-engages Violinist.

Jacob Rittenband, the violinist, played last week in Philadelphia, pleasing his audience immensely and receiving many encores. A return engagement with the Crescent Musical Club was offered and accepted on the spot.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach in Boston.

Dropping the usual reserve of polite society and of the musicians who know and who also write, the distinguished audience comprising Boston's best known people gave Mrs. Beach a rousing cheer as she made her first appearance on the platform of Steinert Hall after an absence of more than three years. And as the concert progressed, many signs of approval were showered upon the Boston woman, who is acknowledged to be one of the greatest of female composers. The climax was reached when after an admirable performance of Mrs. Beach's quintet, op. 67, the audience applauded her for some minutes. The Hoffman Quartet with the composer at the piano, gave a splendid reading of this beautiful work. At the close of the program, Mrs. Beach held an informal reception on the stage of the hall, and shook hands with some 250 persons.

Among Boston's leading musicians who attended the concert were Arthur Foote, Carl Faelten, George W. Chadwick, Philip Hale and H. T. Parker.

The following notices are culled from the Boston papers:

Mrs. Beach's first prolonged period of European study having been abruptly brought to a close, she takes up again those annual recitals so well remembered here. This winter's concert is devoted entirely to her own compositions for piano, voice, and strings. All, with one exception, are new (three from MSS.), composed at the age . . . when wealth of feeling is controlled and expressed by the resources of an art long and seriously studied. Certain supposedly fortunate persons are described as being "born with a silver spoon in their mouths." Mrs. Beach must have been born with melody in hers, for it is said she could sing an air of Handel's at the age of two and was a composer, and appeared in public as pianist at the age of seven. She was then a prodigy from New Hampshire . . . and is now known throughout this country and in Europe as a composer of distinction.—Boston Advertiser, December 17, 1914.

For some years Mrs. Beach has been living in Germany, where she has appeared as composer and pianist in several cities and with marked success. Her concert yesterday was the first that she has given since her return to Boston. The years pass quickly. It is hard to realize that her "Gaelic" symphony was produced here at a symphony concert in 1896; her piano concerto in 1900; her Mass. at a Handel and Haydn concert, as far back as 1892; that her first appearance as a pianist in public was in 1883, when she was sixteen years old. Her life has been productive.

Her talent as a song writer has been recognized by the general public and by leading singers. . . .

The new piano pieces have interesting moments, especially the prelude and fugue, . . . there are ideas and workmanship in this composition. . . .

Mrs. Beach was warmly applauded by a very friendly audience. And there were flowers in profusion.—Boston Herald, December 17, 1914.

During her residence in this city Mrs. Beach afforded pleasure to her friends by her annual recitals of piano music, in which her own compositions found a place. By her pianistic skill and her insight she made her gifts as interpreter equal those as composer. Her playing now, after appearances with orchestra and in recital in Berlin, Leipsic and Dresden, has more emotional variety, more authority. There is unquestionably a gain in fluency of technic. There were two new compositions for the piano played from manuscript and for the first time a prelude and fugue and a waltz fantasie.

. . . The audience was a large one and showed its approval emphatically.—Boston Globe, December 17, 1914.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, appearing as composer and pianist, was assisted by Mme. Karola Frick, soprano, and the Hoffmann String Quartet, when a concert consisting entirely of her own compositions was given yesterday afternoon in Steinert Hall. . . .

The quintet is one of the most solid, in ideas and structure, of Mrs. Beach's later compositions. The ideas have value and contour, and their development is both musicianly and effective. The performance was brilliant, authoritative. Mrs. Beach's talent as a pianist was displayed in her performances of a prelude and fugue, a "Valse-Fantasie" in MSS., and the piano part of the quintet. She has an uncommonly finished technic, a beautiful tone, and always good taste as an executant. The audience was large and cordial.—Boston Post, December 17, 1914.

Mrs. Beach's manifold gifts have made a prominent place for her. She is a woman of whom American music lovers should be proud, for she dignifies her profession and gives pleasure to many, not only with her extremely skillful pieces of chamber music and her melodious and sympathetic songs, but also with her spirited piano playing. Her genial personality contributed many appealing strains, now pathetic and again humorous, to her works, particularly to her lyrics, and her success in the more abstruse forms of music, as in the quintet that she played yesterday with the Hoffman Quartet, has been impressive.

The program for this professional home-coming included several new compositions, such as the prelude and fugue and the waltz-fantasy played by the composer herself, and songs sung by Mme. Karola Frick. The quintet for piano and strings completed the program.

Flowers and applause were lavishly bestowed upon the heroine of the occasion.—Boston Journal, December 17, 1914.

Marion Green, Minneapolis Symphony Soloist.

The variety of Beethoven's great nature was yesterday heard in his first violin romance played so reverently by Concertmaster Czerwonky, and the four songs which were so unobtrusively and finely sung by Marion Green. From the full richness of the "Romance's" double stopping to the serious adornment of Goethe's "Mit Madeln sich vertragen," through the dark retrospect from the grave in "In Questa Tomba" to Gellert's nobly religious "Bitten" and the heroic universal religion of "Die Ehre Gottes," there was an ascent through the most serious traits of mankind's strivings. Mr. Green's manly presence and finished mastery of his art added much and worthily to this festival program.—Minneapolis News, December 8, 1914. (Advertisement.)

MABEL SHARP-HERDIEN, SOPRANO, AND ROSE LUTIGER GANNON, CONTRALTO.

Two Chicago Artists Who Have Attained to a Foremost Position Among Present Day Celebrities.

Mabel Sharp-Herdien.

Mabel Sharp-Herdien, soprano, occupies an assured position with the foremost oratorio and concert singers of the present day. She is an American artist who gained her entire musical education in this country, and whose development and rise to her present position of eminence has been won in America, and she need not fear comparison with any of the leading sopranos of Europe or elsewhere. It was the beauty, richness and maturity of this gifted singer's art that led one of America's prominent critics to write of her: "One must seek her rivals among the famous stars of the lyric stage."

Mrs. Herdien's repertoire includes the best in song literature, English, French, German and Italian, and the leading roles in all the principal oratorios. She is soprano soloist at Sinai Temple, Chicago, Ill., and the Sunday Evening Club, and has appeared as soloist ten consecutive times with the Apollo Musical Club of Chicago.

Two important dates that Mrs. Herdien has for this year are in "The Messiah" (in German), with the Milwaukee A Capella, and in Mendelssohn's oratorio, "St. Paul," with the newly organized Choral Society of Kansas City, Mo.

Mrs. Herdien filled, among others, the following engagements last year: Illinois Athletic Club; Amateur Musical Club, Peoria, Ill.; Boeppler Orchestra; Normal School, two appearances; South Shore Country Club; Dubuque, Ia., recital; Bach Choral Club; Oriental Consistory, three appearances; Chicago Musical College, faculty concert; Evanston, in "The Messiah"; Mu Phi Epsilon concert; Apollo Club, two appearances in "The Messiah"; Dubuque, Ia., in "The Messiah"; Mozart Club, Pittsburgh, in "The Messiah"; Cleveland, Ohio, recital; Chicago University, concert; City Club, concert; Glen Ellyn, concert; Mendelssohn Club, soloist; Sunday Evening Club, concert; Kewanee, Ill., two appearances; Medinah Temple, concert; Ravenswood, concert; Amateur Musical Club, Chicago; Standard Club Chicago; United German Societies; Grand Rapids, concert; Oberlin, Ohio; Eau Claire, Wis., two appearances; Chicago Heights, Marion, Ind.

Rose Lutiger Gannon.

Rose Lutiger Gannon, one of the foremost American contraltos, has been in great demand not only in her home city, Chicago, Ill., but her services in concert, church, oratorio and recital have been requested from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast. For the past seven years Mrs. Gannon has been soloist at Sinai Temple, Chicago, and for the last six seasons with the Sunday Evening Club.

Possessing a stage presence which charms and with a vast repertoire at her command, there is little wonder at the fact that Mrs. Gannon counts innumerable admirers all over the country. Her voice is a rich contralto, pure in quality and exquisitely fresh. Refinement and a finished artistry characterize her interpretations, which are also marked by a striking individuality. Mrs. Gannon during the past season has appeared as soloist with the following orchestras, choral societies, clubs, schools and universities: Chicago Symphony Orchestra; New York Symphony Orchestra; Sinai Temple Orchestra; Richmond Orchestra; Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; National Symphony Orchestra; Denver Symphony Orchestra; Apollo Club, of Chicago; Chicago North Shore Festival, Evanston, Ill., two engagements; German Sing Verein; Irish Choral Club; Arion Club, A Capella and Lyric Glee Club, Milwaukee; Oberlin Choral Union; Schubert Club, Grand Rapids; Mendelssohn Club, Chicago; Cornell College Choral Union; Kenosha Choral Society; Seattle Choral Society; Portland, Ore., Choral Society; San Antonio Choral Society; Green Bay, Wis.; Fort Collins; Houston, Tex.; Kansas City; Valparaiso, Ind., festival; South Bend, Ind., festival; Philharmonic Club, Minneapolis; Winona, Minn.; Spokane Society, Washington; Washington University; Chicago University; Colorado University; Madison University.

Brooklyn Society Sings "Messiah."

Every seat in the spacious opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music was taken on Tuesday evening, December 22, and the big audience listened with evident interest and reverential enjoyment to "The Messiah" production by Walter Henry Hall's responsive chorus, more than 250 members strong, assisted by a large orchestra and these soloists: Agnes Alsop Ward, soprano; Ida Gardner, contralto; Dan Beddoe, tenor, and Robert Maitland, baritone.

This concert marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, instituted by Mr. Hall and continuously under his leadership during this period. The Brooklyn Oratorio Chorus and the Columbia University Chorus (Mr. Hall is the director of choral music at Columbia University) cooperated on this occasion.

Mr. Hall must have been particularly gratified at the unanimity with which the choral members followed the authoritative movements of his baton. The audience certainly was.

Concerted attacks, good shading and phrasing, understandable diction and impressive finals gave evidence of conscientious weekly rehearsals under Mr. Hall's dictation. There was a notable quality of musical tone among the sopranos. The forcing, which too often mars the singing of non-professional soprano choirs, was delightfully absent. Tenors, altos and basses were also dependable throughout. Splendid effects were attained by well developed climaxes. "Behold the Lamb of God" was an embodiment of excellent ensemble singing; spirit and finish entered into the inspiring "Hallelujah Chorus."

Dan Beddoe's opening "Comfort Ye" and "Every Valley" set the standard high for the work of the evening. The delicious quality of his voice and his knowledge of oratorio style keeps Mr. Beddoe in the foremost ranks of oratorio tenors; in the accompanied recitative, "Thy Rebuke Hath Broken His Heart," for instance, the words "Thy rebuke" signified far more than mere words as sung by this tenor.

Robert Maitland, basso, infuses genuine dramatic fire into his singing, and his excellent and well trained voice is in accordance.

Ida Gardner's real contralto voice and feeling for musical detail, especially in her delivery of the favorite contralto airs, "He Shall Feed His Flock" and "He Was Despised," pleased her listeners.

Agnes Alsop Ward met the taxing demands of the soprano recitatives and arias with ease and understanding.

Samuel Quincy was at the organ.

An orchestra of forty musicians, F. Lorenz Smith, concertmaster, gave an ingratiating reading of the "Pastoral" symphony directed by Mr. Hall, and the support throughout was admirable.

David Bispham Fights for Americans.

David Bispham does not agree with those who believe that American composers who are worthy will not need to have their cause championed. Mr. Bispham bore high the banner of American composers long before it ever seemed probable that songs by Americans should become a regular section of every artist's program. One could say that in many cases he has forced this issue. One may also go further and say that he does not only search among the thousands of compositions sent to him with the hope that he may sing them, for songs that appeal to the public, that are learned quickly and that are "easy," but he has been also the inspiration to many to write in a serious vein as he has been willing to study songs that were not easy, that needed long assimilation and that needed the same amount of work, thought and interest which are necessary to learn a song by Richard Strauss. In this has David Bispham been the wonderful champion. He has sung numbers that were not obvious, not "catchy," just because they were good music of the same intricate sort that he found among songs of Strauss, Brahms and Hugo Wolf, and he has paid his countrymen and women the compliment to regard their work seriously, in which Mr. Bispham is nearly unique.

Evans' Tenth Annual Philadelphia Recital.

Edwin Evans gave his tenth song recital in this city at Witherspoon Hall last evening. The singing of this baritone is so finished and so polished that it is always delightful to hear him, and especially so in the admirable programs he gives, which are always filled with novelties. Last evening he sang no less than thirteen songs, which were heard here for the first time, and one of them was in manuscript, "Bring Her Again, O Western Wind," which was written by Stanley Addicks, who accompanied the singer. Mr. Evans has a remarkable range of voice, and it is even and mellow in its entire register. He also sings with splendid taste.. The Press.

As usual at the recitals of Edwin Evans, baritone, the program contained many lovely new songs, as well as some of the standard old things. . . . Undoubtedly much of the enjoyment was due to the fine enunciation of the singer. All the pleasure that can be conveyed through the medium of good, clearly-sung English, is to be had when Evans sings. The Addicks song, "Bring Her Again, O Western Wind," given for the first time in this city, proved captivating and had to be repeated. . . . The expression throughout was notably interesting.—Record.

. . . Mr. Evans has many times proved his right to rank among the leading vocalists of the city, and his appearance was marked not only by the pleasing quality of his voice, but by the entirely interesting nature of the program which abounded in novelties. A full dozen numbers were sung for the first time here. . . .—Telegraph.

. . . The selections on the program were happily chosen, as they not only displayed the soloist's splendid range of voice, but were in themselves of much interest and charm. . .
. . . Several . . . new songs found great favor with the audience, their possibilities for tender and sympathetic reading being realized by Mr. Evans to a commendable degree. "Eve, and a Glowing West" he infused with as much color as a sunset, and his rendition of "An Evening Song." with its refrain, "Go Along Child to Sleepy Town," was beautifully done. . . .—Bulletin.

. . . Mr. Evans has a voice of carefully graduated and equalized timbre, and judicious training; a voice that serves him well at either extreme of its compass, and sincerely pleased those who heard him last evening.—Ledger. (Advertisement.)

Soder-Hueck Pupils in Joint Recital.

On Friday evening, December 18, two of Mme. Soder-Hueck's pupils appeared in a joint recital at Englewood, N. J., where they met with fine success.

Evangeline L. Haucke, whose voice is a pure lyric soprano of sweet sympathetic quality with ringing high notes, sang the "Jewel Song" from "Faust" in brilliant style. Her group of songs by modern composers was exceptionally well rendered and the audience would not be satisfied until she sang an encore.

Walter S. Wagstaff, baritone, whose singing at a concert in the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, New York, created a sensation last season, was heard in a group of songs, and sang the "Cantique de Noel" (Christmas song) by Adams, in such a praiseworthy manner that he was obliged to respond to two encores. Mr. Wagstaff possesses a rich baritone voice of splendid quality, charged with the vigor and enthusiasm of youth. A brilliant future is predicted for this promising young artist.

In the duet, "Calm as the Night," by Götze, these two voices blended beautifully and had such an effect on the audience that they were forced to repeat the number.

Every fourth day or so there is cabled over Tommy Atkins' description of a battle: "First you 'ears a 'ell of a noise and then the nurse says, "Sit up and drink this.'" Which only goes to prove that in these martial days, even a well established wheeze is no longer a veteran until it's been under fire.—New York Evening Sun.

On American Music.

Norwood, Ohio, December 17, 1914.

To the Musical Courier:

We have been so in the habit of becoming enthralled with the mysteries of strange gods, the alleged profundities of unknown tongues and foreign cults that Americans are in danger of losing their identities. The zeal of advance agents casts a glamour about every imported musician or composition. The more foreign or remote the better. Curiosities are in demand.

If the composers of this country will endeavor to help each other and without jealousy will recognize the message that may be expressed in a composition, we will evolve an American mode of musical thought and idiom. It is not at present difficult to recognize that of England, France, Germany, Spain, etc., and the skillful American composer may imitate their styles or characteristics. But America is as yet too cosmopolitan in its higher musical circles, to be distinctively American. It does not know itself. Only among the homely and lower circles of musicians can true American music be found. No foreigner understands it, even though he become naturalized. It requires one "to the manner born," bred in the bone. One must be able to call to mind the frontier or pioneer days to understand it fully. I do not know whether we have one such among the musical critics of today. The tendency seems to be to judge everything by foreign standards.

We all know how much is lost by translating a poem from one language to another. The inner meanings are lacking. We think music is a sort of universal language, but this is only very superficially so. The "Marseillaise" means much more to a Frenchman than to any other.

Not until American composers will honor each other will American music attain a standing demanding the respect of other nationalities.

Very sincerely,

D. W. Miller.

American Scandinavian Society Concert.

The American Scandinavian Society announces its second concert in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of January 10. The Scandinavian orchestra considerably augmented this season, Ole Windingstad director, will play a program of modern Swedish and Danish music.

Much interest centers in this concert because of the engagement of Julia Claussen, the contralto, and M. Per Bioorn, baritone of the Berlin Royal Opera. These artists will be heard in operatic arias with orchestral accompaniment.

The orchestral selections promise no little novelty; three compositions new to America will have a hearing. Prominent among them is the first symphony of Niels Gade, the Danish composer. A suite of five pieces by Tor Aulin, written to Stindberg's "Master Olaf" and Sinding's "Rondo Infinito" will also be performed.

The management feels much gratified at the previous reception from the public in general, and there is no doubt that the association has an active and influential future. Its artistic aims are commendably high, and have in the past been successfully realized. The coming concert surpasses in every respect anything that has been attempted by the organization, and there is every reason to believe that it will prove to be a brilliant occasion.

Donaldson's Recent Recital.

Gay Donaldson, the baritone and teacher of Cleveland, Ohio, and vicinity, recently appeared in a recital in that city, scoring a brilliant success. His program was varied and full of interest, but probably the number which aroused the imagination to the fullest extent and left the most lasting impression was one of Charles Wakefield Cadman's Indian idealizations with ultramodern harmonies. This song, "At the Feast of the Dead I Watched Thee," served to display the deep sonority of Mr. Donaldson's voice as well as his excellent diction. Among his other numbers were Homer's "Uncle Rome" and "Banjo Song," showing the singer in a brighter mood. His interpretative and dramatic powers served to make his closing number, "Three Comrades," something to be long remembered by his audience.

On this same evening Dr. Arthur Reginald Little, pianist, was heard in these numbers: "Chant Polonaise," Chopin-Liszt; "Hungarian Rhapsody," Liszt; "Barcarolle," Rubinstein; "Nachtstueck," Schumann, and "Hark! Hark, the Lark" and "Erlkönig."

An Appreciative Dudley Buck Artist-Pupil.

An interesting interview with Marie Morrisey, the contralto, who scored a marked success at her recent recital in Aeolian Hall, New York, appeared in the women's section of a recent issue of the New York Press. Mrs. Morrisey, who is an artist-pupil of Dudley Buck, the vocal teacher of New York, is very enthusiastic in her praise of this gentleman. She spoke of him as the man "whom I knew to be the very best vocal teacher I could find anywhere. He took my voice and shaped it and trimmed it and patterned it according to his own ideas, and what it is now I owe to him." Surely no teacher could desire warmer appreciation.

Mrs. Morrisey is having a busy season in concert work in addition to her duties as contralto soloist of a well known Brooklyn church.

New Sacred Cantata.

An interesting special Christmas service was given at the Mount Auburn Baptist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, Sunday morning, December 20, on which occasion soloists from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra took part in the first performance of a sacred cantata, "The Coming of the Anointed," for solos, chorus, harp, string quartet and organ, by C. Hugo Grimm, organist of the church. This cantata is conceived thoroughly, in the spirit of the text, and is well and effectively written. The opening and closing numbers contain specially good thematic material, which is well worked out.

Bostonians to Hear Mme. King Clark.

Mrs. King Clark will give a song recital in Boston at the New Toy Theatre, on the afternoon of January 10.

RUTH McTAMMANY WITH PROFESSOR MARIO LO ZITO AND HIS NEW YORK CITY MARINE BAND, AT INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION OF INVENTORS, HELD AT GRAND CENTRAL PALACE, NEW YORK, DECEMBER 12-19 INCLUSIVE.

Ruth McTammany's New York Success.

Ruth McTammany, soprano, and niece of John McTammany, inventor of the player piano, delighted the large audiences at the International Exposition of Inventors, held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, from December 12 to 19.

Ruth McTammany is a mere slip of a girl and few imagined that such a slender miss could fill the enormous auditorium with her voice; in fact, not only the size of the place would have been a handicap to many singers, but numerous large pillars and the clatter of hundreds of machines combined to distract and disturb the artist and were enough almost to nullify her vocal efforts. But despite these hindrances, Miss McTammany's voice proved equal to the ordeal and could be heard high and clear above the din of men and machinery, and before the last note had died away amidst the labyrinth of posts and pillars of the huge palace, the people arose and cheered her to the echo. Thus the little country girl from the West made her bow to the East.

Ruth McTammany had oft dreamed of the eventful day when she should make her debut before the public. She pictured the opera house with its dazzling appointments; she could see the curtain rise, revealing the large and expectant audience; and she could hear the soft faint tones of the orchestra that was to accompany her to failure or triumph. All this, Ruth McTammany had dreamed; but it is the unexpected that frequently happens in this world, and that is what occurred in this instance.

Ruth McTammany, like many others, had spent years abroad, fitting and qualifying herself for a public career, and the time had arrived when she was to make her debut in Germany this season; but as the poet remarked:

> The best laid schemes o' mice and men
> Gang aft a-gley;
> And leave us naught but grief and pain
> For promised joy.

The war clouds were overhanging Germany and there was little or no opportunity for artists to make their debut, so there was nothing left for Miss McTammany to do, but return to her own United States a disappointed and disheartened singer, and here await a more convenient season. But the International Exposition of Inventions was about to open its doors, and a competent singer was desired. Miss McTammany's name was mentioned and her services accepted, and thus it came to pass that Ruth McTammany made her debut in the Grand Central Palace of New York, instead of in Berlin, Germany. The range and quality of her voice are all that could be desired, while she is the possessor of a genial and most engaging personality.

The orchestra or accompanist can do much to make or mar the success of an artist, and especially on such an occasion, but it can be said to the credit of Prof. Mario LoZito and his New York City Marine Band that from the moment the exposition opened on December 12 until it closed on the 19th, his whole aim and object seemed to be directed toward insuring the success of the gifted Ruth McTammany, who fully realizes that fact and gratefully acknowledges her indebtedness to Prof. Mario LoZito and his splendid band.

A Prominent Newkirk Pupil.

Lillian Sherwood Newkirk's pupil, Alice E. Smith, was the principal soloist at the annual musicale given by the ALICE E. SMITH AND LILLIAN S. NEWKIRK.

National California Club in New York, on Tuesday, December 15. Miss Smith sang "Bergere Legere" and "Menuet de Martini," old French; "Elegie," with violin obligato, Massenet; "Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces," Wilson; "My Heart Is a Lute," Woodman; and "Skee Song," Clough-Leighter. Other assisting artists were Ida Thelma Taylor, pianist; Lucile Collette, violinist; N. Valentine Peavey, vocalist, and Lillian Birmingham.

Mrs. Milton V. Snyder, chairman, wrote Miss Smith a letter of thanks and congratulation, in which she especially mentioned "her splendid tone placement and elegant diction," which she says "is something rarely heard in English song singing in New York." These qualities are among those upon which Mrs. Newkirk lays special stress, and her many successful pupils attest to the efficacy of her methods.

Rudolph Ganz—An Appreciation.

The appended article by Charles Arthur Ridgway, of Dayton, Ohio, was published in the newspapers of that city following Rudolph Ganz's recital there:

"As Switzerland is a healthy country, so is Ganz a healthy pianist; not only physically, but mentally, and we also say morally. His playing gives one the impression of a clear and beautiful day among the Alps; it is unaffected playing without morbidity; it is clean-cut, perfect in technic, sane in interpretation, it reflects the bigness of the mountain country. At the same time it is not lacking in dramatic force, or in soothing, singing tenderness.

"Rudolph Ganz is a many-sided, and well-balanced artist. The three 'T's,' Technic, Taste and Temperament are his in happiest combination. While possibly not so emotional as Paderewski, he has plenty of feeling, controlled, however, at all times by a fine mentality. Technically, his playing is marvelous. His active work is wonderful; he has great power; he makes the piano sing or storm at will. His light playing is like sparkling sunlight and there seems to be no limit to his speed. The program was well selected to show the breadth of his art, no two numbers being of similar style or character.

"Piano playing like that given us by Mr. Ganz cannot fail to have a strong influence in the musical uplift of Dayton and the thanks of the musical public are due to those who made it possible to hear him. He should be heard here again in the near future."

Oskar Rust Directs Elks' Music.

On December 6, 1914, Elks memorial services were held by Little Rock Lodge, No. 29, Little Rock, Ark., under the direction of Oskar Rust. The musical program consisted of solos sung by Albert E. White, baritone; Mrs. David M. Bachrach, soprano, who sang "The Day Is Ended," Bartlett, with violin obligato played by Oskar Rust; a funeral march, Federigo-Fiorillo, played by Oskar Rust, with orchestra accompaniment, and numbers by a vocal quartet and orchestra.

Oscar Seagle's Buffalo Encomiums.

The Chromatic Club is to be congratulated in bringing to Buffalo so distinguished an artist as Oscar Seagle, famous baritone, who at his former appearance here last season won overwhelming success, which he repeated in full measure yesterday afternoon in a recital at Orpheus Hall. The audience was so large that only standing room was to be had and the enthusiastic and spontaneous applause after every number testified to the appreciation his fine work elicited.

Mr. Seagle is a singer of intellectual equipment which encompasses the contents of each song he delivers, and he is a magician in the art of coloring every tone. Superb diction, a highly developed dramatic sense and manly delivery add to the pleasure which his vibrant and imposing voice gives in his interpretations.

His opening number, the aria, "Eri tu," from "Un Ballo in Maschero," by Verdi, was delivered with forceful declamatory style leading up to a wonderful vocal appeal. The French songs, "Musette" and "Chanson à danser," songs of the sixteenth century, were so delightful and given with such joyous felicity of expression that they had to be repeated.

The ever beautiful "Ständchen," by Schumann, and two songs by Brahms offered further charm to which the moving intensity and radiance of "Frühlingsnacht," by Rachmaninoff, with its wonderful accompaniment, won such an ovation that Mr. Seagle graciously repeated it.

"Serenade Italienne," by Chausson, alluring in melody and text; two songs by Debussy; "Lamento," by Duparc, intensely tragic, and a tender little song by Cui were gems of vocal utterance.

In the group of songs in English, Mr. Seagle added further enjoyment, especially in "When I Bring You Colored Toys." . . . This had to be sung again. "Ah, Love but a Day," by Mrs. Beach, was the climax in dramatic presentation.—Buffalo Courier, December 6, 1914.

The Chromatic Club did itself honor yesterday afternoon when it brought forward the distinguished American baritone in song recital. To hear Mr. Seagle is to believe that after all there are here and there persons who really do care about the art of singing in this year of our Lord, 1914. . . . The fact that he is an American is an added interest. . . .

Mr. Seagle's beautiful program opened with an aria from Verdi's "Ballo in Maschero," and Bononcini's "Deh piu a me non v'ascendete," followed by two exquisitely beautiful sixteenth century French numbers, which were wonderfully sung. Of the succeeding German group, the song of Rachmaninoff was of special beauty and impressiveness.

In his French songs Mr. Seagle is peculiarly at home. Anything more charming and thoroughly artistic than his performance of the group by Chausson, Debussy, Duparc and Ferrari have not been the writer's pleasure to hear for some time. It was style in the true meaning of the word, wonderful tone production, perfect command of the singer's resources, and all put to the highest end. Mr. Seagle is an object lesson to all students and lovers of singing, and his influence throughout his own country should be very great, for to hear him is the best possible argument that the singer's art is most powerful when it is most beautiful.—Buffalo News, December 6, 1914. December Musicale of Morrill Pupils.

Laura E. Morrill, the New York vocal teacher, gave her December musicale in one of the large music rooms in Aeolian Hall on Tuesday evening December 15. At these musicales the audiences are made up of musicians and lovers of music, many of whom regularly attend the series of such recitals given throughout the season by Mrs. Morrill. On this occasion the audience seemed more enthusiastic than ever before, while the attendance was greater than at any previous musicale given by Mrs. Morrill.

At this December event the soloists included Mrs. Frederick L. Paetzold (Florence L. Chapman), Claire Peteler, Russell Bliss, Bertha Kinzel, Winifred Mason, Clarence C. Bawden and Claribel Harris. Mrs. Paetzold, who is a resident of St. Paul, Minn., sang an aria from "Mignon," displaying a voice of wide range, capable of producing beautiful color effects. She was also heard in a new song by Charles Gilbert Spross, with the composer at the piano. This composition, which received its first public hearing upon this occasion, had to be repeated. Miss Peteler gave an excellent rendition of an aria from "Les Huguenots." Later she was heard in two charming English songs.

As was to be expected, the work of Russell Bliss, Bertha Kinzel, Winifred Mason and Clarence Bawden was exceptionally well done.

Miss Harris, who is a new pupil of Mrs. Morrill, displayed a voice of lovely quality and great promise.

A feature of the evening was the short talk given by Mrs. Morrill on the theme "Individuality and Not Imitation" in singing. Both the theme and the presentation of it interested the audience in addition to supplying a number of facts about which to think and to think hard.

Mrs. Morrill will give a similar musicale on Tuesday evening, January 26, 1915.

Hilda von Taube Wins Applause.

Oskaloosa, Ia., had an opportunity to hear the talented young girl pianist, Hilda von Taube, lately returned from Europe, in a recent concert. The Herald of that city, in its account of her recital there for the Belgian benefit fund, referred to her as follows: "Oskaloosa is time and again favored by visiting artists, but none seemed to appeal to the public as did the music of this young girl."

Young Miss von Taube, who is under the management of Harry Culbertson, of Chicago, has many engagements after January 1.

Boston Commends Gebhard.

Heinrich Gebhard, the Boston pianist, gave his annual recital in that city recently and evoked many words of praise from the critics of the Hub. Mr. Gebhard is a favorite with New England audiences, and this is well merited, for his playing has won for him wide renown. Following are a few press excerpts from Boston papers of December 10, 1914:

He played the music delightfully, with an abiding sense of dynamic values, brilliant and clear technic and with a beautiful touch. . . . If I were a great captain of industry, instead of engaging an organist to play daily in my palace, I should endeavor to persuade Mr. Gebhard to play Bach for me at ease. . . . In the music of Debussy, Mr. Gebhard showed the higher qualities of a sensitive pianist. The nocturne of Chopin was a sketch in black and white. In the pieces by Debussy the pianist was a colorist and a poet. It would not be easy to say in which of these impressionistic pages he excelled. . . . He gave a remarkably beautiful reading of "Cloches à travers les feuilles" and "La Terrasse des audiences." . . .—Boston Herald.

Mr. Gebhard was wholly in the vein, and seldom of late years has he done his talent and his long periods of serious study more justice. He is a thrice admirable musician, as well as an accomplished virtuoso. Interpretating the music of Debussy, he is equally successful in catching the illusive and impressionistic moods of the little pieces, and at the same time demonstrating in an authoritative manner their logic of construction. . . .—Boston Post.

Mr. Gebhard is an artist of romantic and emotional aspect, as could be easily seen by the program which he presented. He employs great variety of tone color in effective proportion and possesses a sensuous tone of appealing warmth and beauty. . . . His interpretations always were interesting, in which he never allowed sentiment to become cheap sentimentality. . . . Mr. Gebhard played the French suite by Bach with a grace and freshness in due keeping with its character. . . . The first two numbers of Chopin were played in true Chopinistic style, with rare finish and refreshing simplicity. . . . Among the many pleasant features of Mr. Gebhard's performance was his original interpretation of Debussy numbers; . . . throughout these numbers he showed rare artistry in the beauty and originality of his playing, and proved himself an interpreter of uncommon merit. . . .—Boston Advertiser.

Heinrich Gebhard, the Boston pianist who upon more than one occasion in the past has given promise of attaining true distinction, played in his recital in a manner to warrant all expectations of him. . . . There was in Mr. Gebhard's playing an authoritative individuality, the conviction in the mind and musical sense of the hearer, that the music was being interpreted by a mature artist, by one comprehensive in his grasp of technical difficulties and of the plan of emotional values, by one who could reproduce the succession of moods in their true proportion. . . . Always a pianist of poetic sensibility in touch and perception, Mr. Gebhard drew from his piano a kaleidoscopic series of colors and painted a procession of moods. . . .—Boston Globe.

Wheeling Lauds Kerr.

U. S. Kerr, the basso cantante, gave a recital in Wheeling, W. Va., on December 28. Attached are two press comments on this concert, which show that Mr. Kerr's work is appreciated:

One of the delightful musical affairs of the season was the concert at the Elks' Club Auditorium last evening, when U. S. Kerr, basso-cantante, of New York, assisted by Adelaide Schockey and Prof. Herman Schockey, of this city, was presented in concert. The program was of an unusually pleasing nature, consisting of numbers, both light and heavy, pleasing to all classes of musical lovers. Mr. Kerr, possessing a voice of unusual depth and richness, completely captivated his audience.

In addition to the English songs, the artist gave numbers in French, German, Italian and Norwegian. Each appearance of the famous basso was greeted with applause.

Of Miss Schockey it can be said that she is one of Wheeling's most talented pianists. Her solo, Schubert's "Marche Militaire," was rendered in a pleasing manner, displaying to perfection both the technic and expression of the number.

Professor Schockey, as accompanist, contributed much to the success of the affair. He has made for himself the reputation of being one of Wheeling's best musicians, as well as an accompanist and an instructor. Music lovers of Wheeling were indeed favored with a musical treat by the presentation of such well known artists. —The Wheeling Telegraph, December 19, 1914.

A large audience was delighted to the fullest extent with the song recital given at the Elks' Club Friday evening by U. S. Kerr, assisted by Adelaide Schockey. It seemed that the program could not have been better arranged to suit the hearing, as each succeeding number proved more popular, as the qualities of Mr. Kerr's rich basso voice were strongly brought out. The ever popular "Rolling Down to Rio," by German, was received with as much enthusiasm as ever, and "To the Evening Star," from "Tannhäuser," and the "Toreador Song," from "Carmen," were much applauded. Adelaide Schockey needs no introduction to music lovers of Wheeling, and her number of last night exceeded former playing by this talented musician. H. M. Schockey was the efficient accompanist to Mr. Kerr.—The Wheeling Daily News, December 19, 1914. (Advertisement.)

CENTURY OPERA IN CHICAGO.

"Faust," December 20.

A creditable performance of Gounod's masterpiece brought out Orville Harrold in the title role, Henry Weldon was a devilish Mephisto, Louis Kreidler a vigorous Valentine, Kathleen Howard made up a good looking Siebel and Lois Ewell a naive Marguerite. The other parts were in good hands and Agide Jacchia conducted.

The night of the Walpurgis, which is always omitted in America, was presented by Anna Pavlowa and her company. As for Miss Pavlowa's dancing only superlatives can express the delight she gave again to her many admirers. She is one of the ballerinas par excellence. Her technic of the difficult terpsichorean art is absolute. She won an overwhelming and legitimate success.

"Pagliacci," December 21.

On Monday evening "Pagliacci" with Helen Stanley as Nedda—a role beautifully suited to her voice and in which she scored heavily—was the bill. Miss Stanley looked well in her original costume and made her Nedda striking and attractive. Morgan Kingston found Canio one of his best parts and after the Lament he received salvos of applause. Thomas Chalmers distinguished himself as Tonio. Graham Marr as Silvio and Hardy Williamson as Peppe rounded up an excellent cast. Agide Jacchia conducted.

After the opera Pavlowa and her ballet were seen in "The Magic Doll," and, for the first time in Chicago, in modern ballroom dances comprising the presentation of the latest dances.

"Cavalleria Rusticana," December 23 (Matinee).

With Bettina Freeman as Santuzza, Morgan Kingston as Turiddu, Kathleen Howard as Mama Lucia, Louis Kreidler as Alfio and Elizabeth Campbell as Lola, "Cavalleria" was presented. Jacchia conducted. The same bill will be given on Sunday evening, December 27. Instead of "The Magic Doll" next Sunday evening Miss Pavlowa will dance in "Amarilla" in which the famous ballerina will close her present season at the Auditorium.

"Faust," December 23 (Evening).

"Faust" was repeated on Wednesday evening with practically the same cast heard at the previous performance.

"Pagliacci," December 24.

"Pagliacci" and Pavlowa brought out a large audience to the Auditorium on Christmas Eve.

"Haensel and Gretel," December 25 (Matinee).

At the special Christmas matinee "Hänsel and Gretel" was given with the following cast: Hänsel, Gladys Chandler; Gretel, Myrna Sharlow; Peter, Louis Kreidler; Gertrude Maude Santley; the Witch, Kathleen Howard and the Sandman and Dewman, Camilla Elkjaer. Joseph Pasternack conducted. "The Magic Doll" with Pavlowa followed.

"Faust," December 25 (Evening).

The same cast heard at the Wednesday performance was billed for this performance.

"Haensel and Gretel," December 26 (Matinee).

A repetition of Humperdinck's lovely opera brought out another good sized audience.

"Pagliacci," December 26 (Evening).

"Pagliacci" concluded the fifth week. A repetition of "Flora's Awakening" and "Modern Ballroom" soirée by Pavlowa followed.

American Institute Students' Recital.

Monday evening, December 21, at the American Institute of Applied Music (Kate S. Chittenden, dean), a recital was given by the piano, vocal and violin pupils, the program consisting of seventeen numbers. All those who participated were well advanced in the musical art. The teachers represented on this occasion were Miss Chittenden and Messrs. Mason, Baker, Sherman, Savage, Hodgson, Lanham and Shradieck. On the program were the classic composers, Bach, Handel, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Haydn and Chopin; the modern composers, Tschaikowsky, Sinding Liadow, Vieuxtemps, Weingartner, Grieg, Saint-Saëns, Moszkowski and Henselt. The American composers represented were Brockway, Chadwick, MacDowell and Mason. These composers are quoted in order to show the quality of music offered at this recital. Some of the accompaniments were played by the soloists, notably Elsie Lambe, who is herself a brilliant solo pianist.

Annabelle Wood, following some years' absence, has returned for further study; she played the Henselt concerto finale as the last number of the recital with fine effect. Others who attracted special attention through their superior playing were Watson H. Gidings, Winifred Lee Mayhall, pianists; George Roudenbush, violinist, and Mrs. A. W. Davis, vocalist. Noticeable was the poise of all concerned in this artistic affair. One very critical listener said, "There was not a bit of bad work anywhere, and much was extremely good."

Elloda Kemmerer's name has appeared in the MUSICAL COURIER within a month in connection with her own recitals. Others who appeared were Alice K. Hoffman, Beulah Beach, Rose Karasek, Anna Curtiss, Grace Gosselin, Rose Edith Des Anges, Mrs. C. L. Test, Alice R. Clausen, Rose I. Hartley, Henry Manning Wells and Adolf Steuterman.

Steinberg on Hebrew Traditional Music.

Bernhard Steinberg, cantor of Temple Beth-El, New York, is the author of a very interesting article on "Hebrew Traditional Music," published October 11 in the New York Tribune. In this he shows that the Hebrew is eminently musical, and that music forms an important part in their lives in all countries. He finds a kinship in some of the music of "Aida" and Rubinstein's opera "The Macabees," with the present orthodox Hebrew chant. He divides the religious music of the Hebrews into two classes. One has been handed down from father to son and is unchangeable. It includes famous responses like "Kol Nidrei," "Borchu," "Sh'ma Yissroel," "Mi Chomocho," etc. These responses change from time to time according to the Hebraic liturgy.

The second class is much freer. In this the cantor has much leeway. He is encouraged to compose his own music or even draw upon the masters for material. There are American cantors who are composers, Max Grauman being the most conspicuous. The late Max Spicker also wrote much beautiful Hebraic music. The word "cantor" signifies "a singer." He has many duties. The entire arrangement of the musical service is by him. He must have not only a beautiful voice, but thorough musicianship and a Hebrew education. In the reformed temples his duties, with the exception of preaching sermons, correspond to that of any clergyman. There is a "Cantors' Association of America," of which Mr. Steinberg is an important member.

Mr. Steinberg's recent concert of Hebrew music in Boston brought forward much beautiful and unknown music. The entire Boston press united in praising both his singing and what he sang. Some of these notices have been reproduced in the MUSICAL COURIER. Mr. Steinberg is busy teaching, having many beautiful voices under his charge. Some of these are engaged in his own choirs, he having two in charge. His handsome residence studio is at 62 West Ninety-sixth street, New York, where on two days weekly he is busy from morning until late in the evening, teaching vocal music. Singer of note himself, having gone through all that a vocalist has to learn before arriving at a definite procedure, Mr. Steinberg is able personally to show "how to do it," and has the rare gift of the teacher's art. The positions occupied by his professional pupils speak more than much trumpeting of his merits; the pupils, and the way they sing, are themselves his best recommendation.

VIOLINIST

"He proved himself a well rounded artist by his interpretation of the Bach Chaconne. The infinite variety and sincere beauty of his tone was well brought out in this composition and the three dances were very charmingly played with rare grace and finish."

—K. C. B. in Boston Daily Advertiser, Nov. 7, 1914.

An Unusually Popular Composition.

Scott Joplin is known throughout the United States as a leading writer of "popular" music, his work having placed him in the front ranks among the composers of that class of work. His latest success is the "Magnetic Rag," and copies may be obtained from the Crown Music Company, 1437 Broadway, New York, or from the Enterprise Music Supply Company, 145 West 45th street, New York.

Paul Draper's Little Theatre Recitals.

Paul Draper, the tenor, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, January 1 and 2, when the Liszt "Faust" symphony will be given.

Mr. Draper, who has made a specialty of lieder singing, will give three recitals at the Little Theatre, New York, on which occasions he is to present remarkable programs. At the first concert which will take place on the afternoon of January 14, he will give a Schubert program consisting of the "Schöne Müllerin" cycle. The second afternoon, January 21, will be devoted to songs by Bach, Schumann and Mossourgski's "Lieder und Tänze des Todes." On January 28, Mr. Draper's program will consist entirely of Brahms' lieder, the first group with words by Daumer, the second group will be "Für ernstige Sänger," and the third group will consist of familiar songs.

From these programs it will be seen that Mr. Draper takes his art seriously and is deserving of praise for the respect he shows it.

New York and Philadelphia press reviews of recent appearances in those cities are given below:

The song recital of Paul Draper . . . marked the first appearance in his native city of a young New York tenor. . . . Mr. Draper shows notable breadth and maturity of musical understanding; besides the artistic quality he has gained by intelligent cultivation, he has much by nature. . . . . It is a serviceable organ unusually responsive to his demands, and capable to a remarkable degree of expressing what he wishes to express.

But the singer's delicacy and warmth of feeling, his insight into the meaning of the music with which he is engaged, the resources which these qualities give him of differentiating and characterizing are worthy of high praise, and are what made his recital of an interest quite its own. He sang the three "Gesänge des Harfners," by Schubert, op. 12; the cycle of "Dichterliebe," by Schumann, and four songs by Karel Szymanowski. To sing the "Dichterliebe" is a task making the highest exactions on any artist's resources of poetical interpretation. Mr. Draper was successful in finding the right accent for each of these sixteen poems. . . . On the other hand, there was real beauty and charm in passages of mezzo and piano. Mr. Draper's phrasing is artistic and his diction finished and clear.—New York Times.

One of the surprises of the concert season was the recital yesterday afternoon of Paul Draper, an American tenor, in Aeolian Hall. . . . Most of the selections were songs of sentiment, and in that type Mr. Draper gave his best performances. His voice is a light lyric tenor. In quality it is extremely pleasing, especially in the softer passages. His singing was always refined, reposeful and finished. A fine legato, good breath control, and, above all, the ability to bring out the inner meaning of his selections—to get beneath the surface of things—were notable in his singing.—New York Herald.

One of the most remarkable song recitals heard recently in Philadelphia was that given in Witherspoon Hall yesterday afternoon by the tenor, Paul Draper. . . .

Draper is an interpreter in the highest sense of the word. Undoubtedly he will become a conspicuous favorite among the many really great singers in this country. . . .—Philadelphia Record, December 4, 1914.

. . . His interpretation, in every instance, was most effective, and to his fine voice he adds splendid enunciation. His voice is richest in its lowest register.—Philadelphia Press, December 4, 1914.

He is a singer who chooses what he sings with the sincere and serious purpose of one who prefers his artistic missions to himself. The remarkable program was divided among three settings of Goethe's poems by Schubert, the cycle of sixteen "Dichterliebe" of Heine in Schumann's setting and four arrestingly unconventional lyrics of Karol Szymanowski, of the singer's own importation.

The songs were sung in the original tongue, with the translation printed in the program. . . .

Though Draper's voice is by no means inferior in quality, the strength of his performance lies in its exquisite sensibility to inner meanings—his intense concentration writes itself in his features w - he sings, and it is as though in a trance he became oblivious to all but the intent and the content of the music. The rare and beautiful individualism of his art was keenly appreciated by those who were present, and the singer has made friends and admirers who would welcome his reappearance and wish for him a wider hearing.—Philadelphia Public Ledger, December 4, 1914.

. . . He sang everything well; he sang many of his songs very well. Mr. Draper has not made the mistake of so many singers who achieve reputation and suddenly find themselves in midstream, without control of their voices. His production is excellent and unfaltering. His natural tone is a highly colorful and pleasing tenor; in his head tones, which he uses without the sentimental effect which is all too common among operatic tenors, he is capable of fine variation and sustained tones. And Mr. Draper appreciates and loves his music, and studies its meaning, so that he can make it his own. To sing the shifting, subtle moods of the "Dichterliebe" cycle, to make his spirit for an hour be one with Heine's, and to end that with the glorious song, "Die alten boesen Lieder," was something of an achievement. . . .—Philadelphia Evening Ledger, December 4, 1914 (Advertisement.)

NEW YORK BREVITIES.

Katherine Mitchell at Patterson Home—Max Jacobs Plays in Tenafly, N. J.—An Hour of Philphonia—Brounoff's Patriotic Song—Adela Bowne in Italy—Nichols Engagements—Notes.

Katherine Mitchell, pianist, one of the instructors in the Patterson Home for Music and Art Students, gave a recital December 16, consisting of the following: Sonata, C major, Beethoven; Melodie, Paderewski; Caprice, Gade; "Winter," "The Brook," "The Eagle," MacDowell. Miss Mitchell has studied both in Europe and America, and in the foregoing brief program showed herself to be an excellent pianist and good musician.

Assisting Miss Mitchell were three pupils of Elisabeth K. Patterson; viz., Estell Leask, Frankie Holland and Mrs. Drew. Miss Mitchell has a good reputation also as accompanist, having appeared in that capacity in various recital halls of New York.

MAX JACOBS' ENGAGEMENTS.

Max Jacobs, the violinist, appeared as soloist with the Neighborhood Glee Club of Tenafly, N. J., on December 18. Following his programmed solo, he played his brother's, Ira Jacobs, violin composition, "Song Without Words" as encore.

Rafael Diaz, tenor, sang three songs by Ira Jacobs, one of which pleased so much it had to be repeated. Charles W. Potter is director of this Glee Club, now in its tenth season.

Mr. Jacobs appeared December 20 as soloist at the North Reformed church of Newark, N. J.

AN HOUR OF PHILPHONIA.

Adelaide Gescheidt, originated "An Hour of Philphonia," which is the name used to designate the weekly gathering of students of the Miller Vocal Art Science. They discuss, demonstrate and receive instruction in the analysis of correct tone in all its phases. A booklet, having to do with this class meeting, contains the following information:

A system of kinetic psycho-physical exercises is used for the synchronous development of the vocal instrument.

The reputation of the class in its unique study is spreading rapidly, through the superior work of its students. Those preparing to teach this system are trained to perfect understanding of voice analysis, thereby gaining knowledge scientifically, practically and artistically.

This class is the Mecca for voice principles of the widest scope. There are no mysteries to the student, for he is made familiar with all that transpires.

The ravages of the European war will undoubtedly destroy most of the traditional sources of voice instruction for several years. Heretofore it was like going to gigantic springs of knowledge, to be musically educated abroad, as all requirements for any form of instruction were available there.

The principles of voice, however, have always been practised in an empirical way and by tradition. In fact, since music became a study in Italy or any other far famed country of Europe, there has never been a logical plan for developing the voice.

A system, therefore, based on natural law, and scientifically correct, certainly must rank highest and be the one in greatest demand throughout the world. The day of empiricism is past. We are now seeking positive instruction, that amalgamates the entire knowledge of nature's way of producing voice Through such understanding, bel canto and artistic singing are re-established. The system is so clear and definite that the scientific discussions of voice and its problems, brought up at the class sessions, are spontaneous. The effectiveness and results speak for themselves.

Miller vocal art science has solved the mysteries of vocal art. Through a number of carefully compiled exercises, and competent teaching of this science by Adelaide Gescheidt and her assistants, a student is enabled to understand and use the voice to the best possible advantage, both scientifically and artistically.

BROUNOFF'S PATRIOTIC SONG.

"America, My Glorious Land" is the title of a patriotic song by Platon Brounoff, words by B. Dahl. This is to be obtained as solo for medium voice or for chorus, which was the original setting. It has been sung by the People's Choral Union with fine success. The MUSICAL COURIER said of this song some time ago, "It is a stirring piece and should become popular."

ADELA BOWNE IN ITALY.

Adela Bowne (Mrs. Henry Philip Kirby) sends the MUSICAL COURIER a picture postcard from Capri, Italy, inscribed as follows: "We are at last on the beautiful Isola da Capri. It is lovely, no signs or agitation of the war here. Our villa is lovely. We are going to it on Saturday. We had a most exciting trip. A Mr. Olsen from Denmark and I are going to give a joint recital in our music room here next month. Best wishes, A. B. K."

NICHOLS ENGAGEMENTS.

John W. Nichols, the tenor, sang in two performances of "The Messiah" with the Chicago Apollo Club last week. He was asked to sing in "The Messiah" for the Mozart Club of Pittsburgh, December 29, but owing to a contract with Jamestown, N. Y., for the same date and work, he was unable to accept the former engagement. Mr. Nichols is booked for the "Rose Maiden" with the Oratorio Society in Waldon, N. Y., January 20. This is his second appearance with this organization. He was also reengaged for a second performance of Matthews' "Conversion" at St. James Church, Brooklyn, December 24.

NOTES.

Edmund Jaques, organist and choirmaster of St. Paul's Chapel, Broadway and Fulton street, will produce "The Message of the Star" by R. Huntington Woodman, January 5, at twelve o'clock noon; the composer at the piano. T. Tertius Noble's "Gloria Domini" is to be performed January 26, with the composer at the organ.

The first annual convention of the American Guild of Organists closes with a banquet tonight, December 30, at 7:30 p. m., Hotel McAlpin, Broadway and Thirty-fourth street. H. Brooks Day, chairman of the committee on public meetings, says in his circular: "There will be no New Year's Day luncheon this year. This dinner will take its place. Members will please mobilize and turn out in goodly numbers. Guests are welcome. We shall have good speakers and a good time. Price of dinner, $2.00."

The second pupils' recital of students who are studying music with F. W. Riesberg, occurred at his residence-studio, Park Hill, Yonkers, N. Y., December 18. Ten numbers made up an interesting program, following which Platon Brounoff played and sang his own music, refreshments were served, and pleasant acquaintance among the pupils was developed. On the program were the following: Ruth Gray, Fricda Murray, Helen A. Munson, Dorothy Andrews, Ethel J. Hall, Bessie Riesberg, Ruth Post, Marcella Riesberg, Rae Clarke, and Helen C. Corwin. Some of the credit of this affair belongs to Miss Munson, Mr. Riesberg's assistant.

Three organ recitals with explanatory lectures were given by Abram Ray Tyler, A. G. O. of Detroit, Mich., formerly of Brooklyn, at Beloit College chapel, Beloit, Wis., December 15, 16, and 17. These three recitals were well planned, as follows: The Office and Possibilities of the Modern Organ, (1) As the Handmaid of Religion, (2) As a concert medium, and (3) As a Representative of the Modern Orchestra.

Among personal cards received from well known musical personages of New York are particularly handsome ones from Lionel Hayes Robsarte, John Dennis Mehan, Ralfe Leech Sterner, Christiaan Kriens, Percy Hemus, Eugenie Pappenheim, etc.

Ganz Captures Dayton, Ohio.

To say that Rudolph Ganz captured Dayton on the occasion of his recent visit there is merely stating a fact. When an artist not only calls forth notices like the appended in the newspaper reviews of his concert, but also inspires a special article of appreciation which was printed in all the papers of the city, capture is a mild way of expressing his triumph—in fact, "conquest" would not be stretching the truth. Here are the notices:

Of Mr. Ganz one could never finish telling. Dayton has been visited by many pianists, pianists who rank foremost in the world, but it can safely be said that none have equaled Mr. Ganz.—Dayton Herald, October 20, 1914.

Musical folk are still talking about Rudolph Ganz, whose marvelous artistry of last Monday evening proved in truth to be the sensation of many musical seasons. Even to experienced concert goers Mr. Ganz proved a revelation. His artistry beggars all description. —Dayton News, October 25, 1914.

Never has Dayton had the opportunity of welcoming to the city a greater master of the piano than Rudolph Ganz.—Dayton Journal, October 25, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Harrison-Irvine's Pupils Heard.

Jessamine Harrison-Irvine is the director of the piano department at St. Margaret's School, Waterbury, Conn. At two recent recitals given by her pupils at this school, compositions by Chopin, Grieg, Moszkowski, Schumann, La Forge, Campbell-Tipton, MacDowell, Dolmetsch, Godard, and Mokrejs were played in excellent style, reflecting much credit upon their gifted teacher as well as themselves. The participants were Ruth Dewsbury, Ruth Cairns, Margaret Milham, Muriel Dorman, Loraine Callan, Hilda Merchant, Laura Barstow, Beatrice Seymour, Louise Wells, Katherine Manning, Anne Delancy, and Eleanor Wells.

Success for Violet Bourne.

The remarkable child pianist, Violet Bourne, who is a pupil of Julie Rive-King, of the Bush Conservatory, Chicago, has created a sensation by her virtuosity and artistic maturity. Her recital on December 11 in the Recital Hall of the Bush Conservatory was such a success that since that date this twelve year old artist has been busy filling drawing room engagements in a number of the most prominent homes of Chicago.

Sunday, December 13, she was engaged to play at the residence of Mrs. George M. Pullman. Among those present were Cleofonti Campanini and Attilio Parelli, conductors of the Chicago Grand Opera Company; Father Finn, conductor of the Paulist Choir; Kenneth M. Bradley, Eleanor Crosby, Herman Weisbach and many other prominent artists and social leaders. It was remarked by many that to see this little girl not yet in her teens seated at the piano in this magnificent music room, surrounded by the most prominent dignitaries from the music and social world, seeing the rapt attention, enthusiasm and spellbound interest of all present, reminded them of the pictures of Mozart playing before the dignitaries of the world when he was at the age of Violet Bourne.

The following is a quotation from one of the many letters of a similar nature which Mr. Bradley has received concerning this child:

Congress Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR MR. BRADLEY—I am still under the fascination that the little girl who played last night in Mrs. Pullman's house gave me. She is phenomenal! (Signed) ATTILIO PARELLI.

Grace Stewart Potter, the pianist, who recently returned to America after many years' residence abroad, states:

I have never heard a child pianist who possesses so many qualifications of greatness as Violet Bourne.

Mrs. Crosby remarked:

She will be one of the greatest if not the greatest pianist the world has ever had.

So great was her success that Mrs. Pullman engaged her for another recital to be given the following Sunday, December 20. Mr. Bradley states that they will permit this little girl to give very few recitals, as they are more anxious about her general education than her music. She is attending the Scholastica Academy in Rogers Park. Next year she will be ready for the high school work, which proves that she has not been neglected in the fundamentals of her education.

This child is unusually fortunate in being able to receive personal instruction from such a famous artist as Julie Rive-King. The musical world will watch with interest the future developments of this young child.

Sophia Kassmir with Pittsburgh Male Chorus.

Sophia Kassmir, who surprised and delighted the audience by the lyric qualities of her voice. Her "Jewel Song" from "Faust" was finely done, and so was Victor Herbert's "Italian Street Song," which had to be repeated on insistent demands from the audience. Miss Kassmir also took part in Max Bruch's "Frithiof." The tenor soloist in this number was Hollis Edison Davenny, who was in fine voice and sang with great acceptability.—Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph, December 5, 1914.

Miss Kassmir . . . won tremendous applause, and deservedly so, for her facile execution of the difficult music. Her voice has beauty as well as individuality. Mr. Davenny did excellent work as Frithiof in the Bruch number of that name.—Pittsburgh Dispatch, December 5, 1914.

The soloists were Sophia Kassmir and Hollis Edison Davenny. They carried off the honors of the evening by their artistic and finished work in "Frithiof," by Max Bruch. The former singer has a rich soprano voice which she uses to excellent advantage. Mr. Davenny is possessed with a beautiful baritone of fine timbre. He scored a decided triumph.—Pittsburgh Post, December 5, 1914.

Sophia Kassmir, an artist, prominent in Europe as well as throughout the United States, and claimed by Pittsburgh as a resident, won a distinct triumph Friday evening when she sang a return engagement with the Pittsburg Male Chorus as soloist in its first engagement of the season in Carnegie Music Hall.

Miss Kassmir was chief soloist at the concert and she was compelled to repond to repeated encores after each number on the program which she rendered. The audience expressed its approval not only by varied ovations, but by the presentation of great armloads of flowers, the number of bouquets being so great that it was necessary to hire a special taxicab in which to carry them away.

Her "Jewel Song," from "Faust," was finely done, and so was Victor Herbert's "Italian Street Song," both of them showing distinct art in the rendering and the fine lyric qualities of her voice. Miss Kassmir also took part in Max Bruch's "Frithiof." Each song she sang she was compelled to repeat by the delighted audience, as well as to offer encores of other songs.

Miss Kassmir's rendition of the aria, "In quelle trine morbide," from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," was beyond description in the beauty of its tones and in its captivating sweetness. . . .

After her triumph in the concert at Carnegie Hall, she left Pittsburgh for New York to engage in concert work.—Pittsburgh Leader, December 6, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Alma Gluck in Grand Rapids.

It was a brilliant audience that greeted Alma Gluck of the golden voice when she made her initial appearance in this city Thursday night at Powers' Theatre. . . . Mme. Gluck won her audience, first by her beauty and the charm of her personality and then completed the conquest with her voice and artistry.

Mme. Gluck's voice is lyric in quality, flexible as a flute and very even throughout the entire range, but especially beautiful in the upper portions, which have great vitality and loveliness of quality. Her method of singing is decidedly after the Italian school. In her style of delivery Mme. Gluck forcibly suggests Marcella Sembrich, whose pupil she is. . . .

She is a master of the art of song and a really great artist. Her program did not make strenuous demands upon her vocal powers. The aria from "Semiramide," by Rossini, served well in showing the beauty and flexibility of her voice. The Rachmaninoff "Peasant Song" revealed a dramatic quality and pathos far beyond any other song on her program. The "Chanson Indoue," Rimsky-Korsakoff, was exquisitely done and was repeated in response to the encore. A modern and brilliant bit of song writing, "Bird of the Wilderness," Tagore-Horsman, was superbly sung. . . .—The Evening Press, Grand Rapids, Mich., December 11, 1914. (Advertisement.)

Sembrich to Aid Polish Sufferers.

Marcella Sembrich, the famous soprano who recently was elected president of the American Polish Relief Fund, will give a song recital in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday afternoon, January 12, the proceeds of which will be given to the fund.

"The acute suffering of the Poles has been little realized in the face of the overwhelming disasters in Belgium, but during the past month reports of heartrending hardships in Poland have stirred the world," says Mme. Sembrich, "and a relief fund was organized here." Mme. Sembrich has the aid of several notables in the administration of the fund's affairs: among the vice-presidents, are Cardinal Farley, ex-Ambassador Curtis Guild, Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., and Mrs. John Rade.

The recital should attract unusual patronage owing to the great love and admiration in which both the Polish and American public hold Mme. Sembrich. Society is prominently represented in the list of box holders.

Morse-Rummel, Violinist, in Richmond.

Mr. Morse-Rummel, who had never played in Richmond before, proved a complete surprise to most of us, playing in a manner that marked him as one who is certain to reach a deserved distinction. He is at his best in pieces that permit him to employ long sustained phrases, for he has the gift that must be given, and cannot be acquired—that of producing beautiful tones. Even when he plays fortissimo, his tone is rounded as well as clear, and when he mutes his instrument the quality that he draws from it is literally lovely. Yet he is no mean technician, for he played one of Wieniawski's terrific tests in admirable style; and his use of harmonies is particularly skillful and certain.—Richmond Times-Dispatch, December 13, 1914.

Mr. Morse-Rummel seems to be destined for greater things. His mastery of his instrument seems perfect, and every tone is brought out clearly and fully sustained. The polonaise by Wieniawski and the praeludium and allegro by Pugnani-Kreisler were splendidly done, and earned Mr. Rummel well merited applause.—Richmond Journal, December 13, 1914. GLENN DILLARD GUNN, the eminent musician writing in the Chicago Tribune last February said: "John McCormack has become an institution with the music loving public of America." Judging by the size of the audiences he is drawing this season, the above statement can be reiterated now with added emphasis. With a concert in Milwaukee on the 10th inst., Mr. McCormack completed the first lap of his 1914-1915 concert tour. It was his twenty-fourth concert since the opening of his season at Grand Rapids, October 28. Immediately after the Milwaukee engagement a start was made for the coast.

In that comparatively brief period he sang before two "sold out houses" in Carnegie Hall, New York, and duplicated the feat at Symphony Hall, Boston. Over a thousand people were denied admission to the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, when he sang there on the 2d. An equal number were turned away from the spacious Auditorium in Chicago, four days later. The authorities stopped the sale of tickets in Toronto after five hundred people were crowded on the stage at Massey Hall, while the audience that crowded Elmwood Music Hall in Buffalo, on Thanksgiving Day, was said to be the largest ever drawn by one artist in Western New York.

The gross receipts for the eight concerts in the six cities named exceeded $40,000. These figures eloquently testify to the high regard and esteem in which Mr. McCormack is held by the music loving public of America.

The following extracts from the leading papers of those cities are also very significant:

NEW YORK SUN

Mr. McCormack's singing of his numbers gave a lavish display in the familiar and beautiful qualities of his voice and style, and it is even possible that he surpassed any former achievements in the fine art and skill with which he sustained his tones. The quality of his voice also seemed unusually rich and mellow in color, and it combined with his interpretative clearness of expression to infuse his delivery with a unique charm and depth of feeling.

NEW YORK WORLD

Once again did McCormack prove his right to be termed an artist. The charm of his beautiful voice and his sincere and musical style grow with repeated hearings. As for this singer's articulation, no other seems capable of equalling it. When McCormack sings one hears not only the melody but every word as well, and therein lies one of the secrets of his deserved popularity.

NEW YORK TIMES

Each recurring season only confirms again the popularity of John McCormack, not only with those allied to him by Irish blood, but also with the admirers of a beautiful tenor voice and a beautiful style of singing.

NEW YORK TRIBUNE

Mr. McCormack has a place of his own in the concert field, and that place he fills with charm.

NEW YORK EVENING MAIL

It was gratifying yesterday to find Mr. McCormack presenting in all sincerity songs of whose value he was clearly convinced, while the sentimentalists opened their eyes in amazement at finding so much simplicity and melody in songs of "high sounding" composers.

NEW YORK EVENING SUN

Huge as was the multitude that greeted John McCormack on Saturday night in Carnegie Hall, it was no more than the Irish tenor's just deserts as a king of hearts in English song. The ease of it all, and the pure English carried on lightest breath to the gallery, should turn rival tenors green with envy.

PHILADELPHIA PUBLIC LEDGER

Since McMormack quitted opera for the concert stage, which is far more congenial to his temperament, his voice has gained in all ways. . . . When a singer carries all before him as McCormack did last night by such a song as that of Hugo Wolf, captious arraignment is silenced. The impression that is left of the haunting loveliness and the human appeal of such singing transcends the reach of censure.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD

McCormack's voice grows continuously more beautiful and mature. In a characteristic program, a notable section was that given over to a group of modern classic songs by Hugo Wolf, Sinding and Rachmaninoff. These gems of poetic melody were sung in English and were therefore the more enjoyed, not only for rhythmic beauty, but also for the sentiments expressed. Probably nothing McCormack sang last night was more artistic than the exquisite song of Hugo Wolf, usually regarded as too elegant and classic for a public recital program.

PHILADELPHIA BULLETIN

The capacity of the Academy of Music was strained to its utmost limit last night to accommodate the audience which crowded it to hear John McCormack, the Irish tenor, who considered themselves fortunate to get seating accommodation there. Every chair that could be found back of the proscenium was requistioned for the use of persons who sat facing the auditorium. Then the dressing rooms were raided for more chairs, until the only one left in those apartments was the one on which McCormack himself rested during the intervals between his songs. Hundreds of persons unable to gain admission went away disappointed. Colonel Bonnafon, of the Academy management, said the size of the audience recalled the days when Patti was at her zenith. The dulcet tones of McCormack's voice—clear, vibrant, now breathing tenderness and love, again dramatic passion, again infinite pathos—swept over the house with an affect that enthralled his audience. A storm of applause was evoked by each of his numbers and he was compelled to respond to encores by singing some of the lyrics he has made peculiarly his own.

TORONTO WORLD

Four thousand people packed Massey Hall last night, constituted a record audience for any soloist in this city, and provided John McCormack with a personal triumph. It is not likely that such an audience, of such a quality, so cordial and enthusiastic, so appreciative and critically discriminating, will be assembled here for a long time to come. He was in perfect form, and his voice had, if possible, a surer touch in that magical certainty with which he throws aloft the wonderful golden thread of song and captures a celestial note whose purity is like a ray of starshine.

TORONTO MAIL AND EMPIRE

. . . There can be no question about the ingratiating qualities of Mr. McCormack's voice. It remains a pure tenor without a touch of the darker tones that so many of the noted tenors of the day cultivate until lovers of the uncolored high voice are found who declare that some of our most famous tenors should be singing baritone. Mr. McCormack has a special gift for communicating to his songs a frank and natural feeling that puts him on an intimate footing with his public.

BOSTON TRANSCRIPT

. . . His tones remain pure tenor tones, without a hint of darkening baritone quality and without a suggestion of thinning reediness or wiriness. They are ingratiating tones to the ear; they are communicating tones for the frank sentiment and the simple humor that Mr. McCormack cultivates. Moreover, he is not careless in song whatever the material upon which he chooses to exercise his vocal instinct, skill and experience. He can conduct and sustain a melody with feeling for it as music; he still smoothes and shades his phrases; he is expert in the art of clear and expressive diction, and while he does cultivate the long held and embroidered high note, he does not force and coarsen his force into "the big tone." He sings what his audiences expect of him; but he can persuade them also into a liking for songs like his classic German pieces yesterday, in which his finer artistries, justly exercised, win them. Then, perhaps, he is a missionary as well as a "favorite."

John McCormack underestimated his popularity yesterday. He arrived at Symphony Hall at 3.30, said he had arranged to leave for New York on the 5.30 train, and marched forth in his jaunty, genial way to be greeted by the record crowd of the season. There was nothing left in the hall but breathing room. If 3,000 were admitted, fully 3,000 more were denied admission. Anyhow at 5.30 the popular Irish tenor was still singing and the audience was still listening contentedly and snapping its fingers at the clock. When McCormack comes, apparently, Boston can't hear enough of him. Anyhow, the upshot of it all was that McCormack and his little party went back to the hotel and Manager Mudgett, of Symphony Hall, jotted down the fact that he had re-engaged the tenor for two concerts more, one on Sunday afternoon, February 21, and the other, Monday night, February 22.

BOSTON JOURNAL

It is now a twice-told tale that McCormack is the foremost ballad singer of the day. The concert stage makes such pressing demands upon him that he has little or no time to appear in opera, much as he is needed in the theatre, for no tenor has yet stepped forward to fill his place in the old Italian operas. And the public yearns to hear him sing the sentimental songs, both sad and blithe, that reach the heart and that show off his tender voice and graceful, pliant style.

BOSTON RECORD

Mr. McCormack was in excellent voice. The first two groups of songs were exquisitely and artistically sung. He shows wonderful skill and great control in his use of the mezza voce quality. He is one of the few operatic singers who, on the concert stage, does not sacrifice both art and voice by a constant and unvarying style to dramatic expression. We must have contrast and Mr. McCormack exemplifies and employs this contrast with powerful color and with true artistic style and finish.

NEWARK EVENING NEWS

. . . In the course of the concert Mr. McCormack again gave proof of his ability to cope successfully with operatic aria, art song and ballad. It would be difficult, indeed, for the critical hearer, who does not allow his personal preference to warp his judgment, to say in which form of lyric expression he is the more interesting and satisfying. Admitting that the majority of those attending his concerts prefer to hear him in the Irish ballads, the pathos or humor in which he publishes more eloquently than any other singer before the public today, yet it must be conceded that his singing of the "Che Gelida Manina" air in Puccini's "La Boheme," which was included among his offerings, . . . is equaled in beauty of tone and tender feeling by few tenors on the operatic stage.

CHICAGO HERALD

So great is the power of John McCormack's art that when the admirable tenor offered a recital at the Auditorium yesterday, not only was every seat in the house occupied, but the stage, too, was packed with a multitude that had been unable to find accommodation elsewhere. Nor should there be left unmentioned another throng which, before the entertainment began, appeared at the box office with money in its hand and hope fluttering in its heart, only to be sent away because there was no place left in which to put it.

Nor must it be declared that the tenor is undeserving of the homage of the crowd. Mr. McCormack is a singer possessed not only of a voice of singular beauty, but a singer who knows how to sing. He clearly had learned his art in the best and most effective school, and, having discovered what the people want to hear from him, he gives them that with vocal skill and with poetic feeling that is entrancing to the ear.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. McCormack doesn't belong just to Ireland, but is the common property of the whole civilized world. He is the common property of the world in the same sense that "Charles O'Malley" is common property. You turn back to it once in a while because it is the best of its kind. As one of the 4,300, I wish to say that I enjoyed Mr. McCormack thoroughly.

BUFFALO TIMES

. . . One of the greatest charms of Mr. McCormack's singing is his perfect double pleasure of delightful music united to an intelligible message. Clarity, sweetness, resonance, amazing breath control, dramatic fervor, in fact, all the excellencies requisite to an effective interpretation of songs are possessed by Mr. McCormack to a high degree.

ROCHESTER EVENING TIMES

Last night at Convention Hall, before the largest audience of the present concert season, and one of the largest of any previous one, John McCormack gave the second in the series of Ellis concerts. From every point of view the concert was most successful. Mr. McCormack has broadened and developed until he has reached a most enviable position among present day artists. There are few voices which are so naturally beautiful as his, and certainly even fewer that are under such perfect control. Mr. McCormack does not rely on the natural perfection of his organ alone, but makes every use of the beauties of phrasing and colors without which real artistic success is not attainable.

ROCHESTER HERALD

. . . One moment his voice is of melting tenderness, at another it rises with glorious buoyancy to a climacteric pinnacle, at the next it is all velvet sweetness. The flexibility with which his voice responds to the emotional nuances, the ease with which it is made to swell forth in vibrant, golden tone, the precision with which it is controlled, all tell in no uncertain terms the heights to which Mr. McCormack has attained in lyric singing.

INDIANAPOLIS STAR

. . . His audience—and this is an official statement—was the largest which ever assembled in an Indianapolis theatre upon any occasion, and the ovation tendered this golden voiced son of Erin was one which will hold a prominent place in the annals of local musical history. . . . In reviewing Mr. McCormack's program there is absolutely no need for one to attempt to analyze the singer's method. It defies analysis, for it seems to belong to no particular school unless it is the school of John McCormack. He just sings, that is all, and that is all he needs to do. He has been richly endowed with the power of pulling the heart strings, of reaching those who love music for its own sake, rather than as mental gymnastics. Unlike many of the concert singers heard today, he indulges in no play acting. Theatricals are left behind and there is no apparent effort on his part to impress his hearers with his personality, other than sincere artistry. That he does make an impression was manifest when he was compelled to give extra numbers following every group. It is an impression of this kind which proves that artist and audience are in perfect accord.

PITTSBURGH DISPATCH

Artistic as well as social distinction marked the recital given last evening in Carnegie Music Hall by John McCormack. The program was anything but hackneyed. Indeed, he went to the opposite extreme of the average recital giver in making up his list. The air of Mozart he sang with a quiet, sure and lovely grace. The group of songs by Korbay, Sinding and Rachmaninoff, as well as Cadman's "Moon Drops Low," proved to be the gems of the evening. At no time did the singer force his voice, nor was he ever off key. Doubtless all the composers represented would have been pleased with the way Mr. McCormick interpreted their songs; and, as the audience also was pleased with most of them, there's nothing more to be said.

DAYTON EVENING HERALD

. . . Magnificent was the welcome Dayton gave John McCormack. Of his singing nothing need be said. He sang as only John McCormack, conceded by the entire world to be the greatest lyric tenor of the day, can sing.

DAYTON DAILY NEWS

. . . To provide ample seating capacity when John McCormack returns here next year is going to prove a big problem . . . since the tenor established an enviable name for himself in Dayton on Thursday night. . . . There is a simplicity which mounts to grandeur as the singer gives you his voice in song, a charm and fascination that holds you powerless to do aught but admire and marvel. You feel that John McCormack might sing just as well before the nobility as in the cottage of one of his Irish neighbors, and there is nothing about him to indicate that he is one of the most celebrated and one of the highest priced tenors before the musical public. He is very natural and it makes him very great, because he is.

DAYTON JOURNAL

. . . Three qualities in McCormack's voice that won the sympathy of the music loving audience were its easy flexibility, its smooth, mellow tones, and the harmony with which he offered his repertoire. Seldom is a tenor found who lilts his way to the top of the high register with as much ease as a sure soprano. But McCormack does, and there is a charm that goes with this facile execution of difficult notes, but then they are not difficult for McCormack. One of McCormack's songs—and he sang many, for the big audience insisted upon it—that was a jewel was "J'ai pleure en reve," which offered the opportunity for his voice to show everything it possessed. There was a lament, a vibrant note of triumph, a touch of the dramatic, and yet a wonderful harmony withal.

THE MUSICAL COURIER EXTRA
Published every Saturday by Musical Courier Co.
Devoted to the interests of the Piano Trade.

A Very Happy and Prosperous New Year to MUSICAL COURIER readers everywhere in the tonal world.

"Though composed by Weber, 'Euryanthe' really marks the beginning of Wagnerism," is the way Henry T. Finck puts it tersely and truthfully in the New York Evening Post.

Josef Lhevinne has been delayed in his sailing for America, and therefore the New York recital announced for the Russian pianist for January 9 has been postponed to a date to be announced later.

A feature of the Flonzaley Quartet program here for Monday evening, January 25, will be the Max Reger quartet in D minor. The other number on the Flonzaley program is the Haydn quartet in D major.

A company incorporated in New York in 1907 for the purpose of distributing music by telephone and other wire methods, went into the hands of a receiver last week, with liabilities of $145,583. The name of the organization was the New York Cahill Telharmonic Company.

At a recent concert of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, the conductor, Emil Oberhoffer, performed his own orchestral arrangement of MacDowell's "Woodland Sketches" with pronounced success. Those very popular pieces always suggested that they would adapt themselves admirably to orchestral treatment and it is a matter for surprise that no one thought of the adventure before Mr. Oberhoffer accomplished it.

To lovers of the Hugo Wolf muse who are acquainted with others of his works beside the songs, it should be gratifying to know that Dr. Ernst Kunwald, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, included the tone poem, "Penthesilea," in his program of December 18. It is a work of remarkable individuality in thought and rare attractiveness in musical content. The overture to Wolf's "Der Corregidor" is another work which should figure more often on orchestral programs than it does.

Percy Scholes, editor of the Music Student, and well known in England as a lecturer on music, has come to America to attend the annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association in Pittsburgh, December 29 to January 1. Mr. Scholes intends to remain in this country several weeks and deliver addresses at various colleges and schools, including Wellesley, Smith, Vassar, South Hadley, etc. New York will hear Mr. Scholes on January 6 at Teachers' College, the subject of his talk being "Britain as a Musical Country," treated from the standpoint of the development of musical education in England.

In a newspaper interview, Oscar Hammerstein gives several reasons for the failure of the Century Opera, but they do not cover any ground not previously discussed in the MUSICAL COURIER. Mr. Hammerstein thinks that the American public wishes to hear good artists at any price, but does not care to listen to inferior ones even for a farthing, or as the impresario puts it graphically: "A man goes to a certain opera, he pays a low price for a seat. Now he either enjoys the performance or he does not. If he remains unmoved, he will not say to himself, 'Well, it only cost a quarter.' The only impression that he carries away is that he was bored, unmoved. In any case, how many artists in the world are there who can touch the susceptibilities, the soul of an audience?" Regarding opera in English, Mr. Hammerstein has come to the decision that there is not enough demand for it to fill a house night after night, and were he to undertake a season of cheap opera, "English opera would be given in its turn with French and Italian opera." Mr. Hammerstein's most interesting announcement is to the effect that if he could come to terms with the Metropolitan Opera House directors he would give cheap opera at the Manhattan Opera House as soon as the present sublease has run out.

In the New York Morning Telegraph one reads this: "Many articles have been written about the revival of 'Euryanthe' at the Metropolitan. There was the usual stuffing of nonsense, the academic displays of enthusiasm, the displays of false ethical standards and the effusions of the petits-maitres or little masters whose well ordered periods sound so mellifluous in their own long ears." The Morning Telegraph said further than the only correct, sensible and authoritative review of the recent "Euryanthe" revival appeared in the MUSICAL COURIER.

A concert is announced by the Edward MacDowell Memorial Association on the afternoon of January 4, in Carnegie Hall, for the benefit of the Peterborough Colony, at Peterborough, N. H. The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra will come to New York for the occasion, this being its only appearance here this season. Olga Samaroff, the pianist, is to be the soloist, and she will play the E flat Beethoven concerto. The orchestral numbers include a Bach concerto for string orchestra, Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony, and the "Dirge" from MacDowell's second suite.

Meyerbeer comes back to New York this evening, December 30, with a production of his "Les Huguenots" at the Metropolitan. It is one of the masterpieces of opera in spite of its musical affectations and the structural looseness of its plot. One often regrets that Meyerbeer had no chance to set a score to a twentieth century libretto. His dramatic instincts would have adapted themselves quickly to the swift moving story which we now demand. Meyerbeer was the victim of his time, when Paris ruled opera and demanded long winded librettos, inappropriate ballets, and music which had to be tuneful first, last and all the time, without much regard for the moods or situations it was intended to reflect. However, the signs of operatic genius are apparent frequently in the works of Meyerbeer and justify Camille Saint-Saëns in his warm tribute of admiration for the German-French composer as expressed in a brilliant essay translated exclusively for the MUSICAL COURIER and published in these columns several years ago. Would Saint-Saëns repudiate his views today because Meyerbeer was born in Germany?

There is no apparent plausible reason why the Metropolitan Opera should have in its repertoire and give in the same week Massenet's "Manon' and Puccini's "Manon Lescaut." The two composers have treated the same subject, but Massenet's masterful handling is so superior to the sketchy, makeshift work of Puccini that impartial observers must wonder at the presence of the twin operas in the Metropolitan list. Caruso sings the role of Des Grieux in both pieces, another remarkable circumstance. Who, if anyone in particular, is responsible for the competition between the French and the Italian "Manon"? There never has been any very strong public demand for the latter. What is the explanation of the matter? It is to be remembered, of course, that the Puccini version brings to the front that charming artist, Lucrezia Bori, in the title role, but she would be no less attractive as Massenet's Manon, a part for which her personality, appearance, and vocal attributes fit her splendidly. "Manon Lescaut" is an early and unripe product from the Puccini pen and there is no artistic need for its continued hearing in New York when its composer is represented here frequently by his maturer and much better "Boheme," "Tosca," and "Madame Butterfly."

CENTURY OPERA CLOSES.

As had been known and generally expected in well informed circles connected with opera—and especially since Otto Kahn's letter was published a few days ago—the Century Opera will close its season in Chicago, January 2, instead of January 16 as originally planned. It is understood that the organization intends to disband altogether.

Before the opening of the eight weeks' season of the Century Opera Company at the Auditorium last November, reports the Chicago office of the MUSICAL COURIER, many of Chicago's most prominent musicians were prophesying a debacle for the company in Chicago, and many wagers were made among musicians that the Century Opera Company would not finish its season there. From the first the society element in Chicago refused its support to the company and made itself conspicuous by its failure to witness the splendid performances given at the Auditorium. The press unanimously praised the work of the principals, orchestra and stage management in every imaginable way. It was pointed out that the company gave better performances at popular prices than any other organization heard in Chicago in recent years. On very few occasions were more than three or four of the fifty-six boxes which comprise the two tiers at the Auditorium occupied; the lower floor was on no occasion filled, and the same was true of the balcony and two galleries.

Our Chicago report runs further: "The champions of opera in English among local musicians who previous to the coming of the Century Opera Company had voiced vigorously their opinion in favor of opera in English, were seldom to be seen at any of the operatic performances given by the Century Company at the Auditorium. Many of those musicians who are so profoundly patriotic for the purpose of publicity have not in any way helped an American company such as that formed by the Aborns and which for the last few weeks has given Chicago exceptionally good performances."

SCHELLING'S WAR TIME TRAVELS.

Ernest Schelling, the pianist, is expected to return to the United States about January 1. Schelling has had a very interesting tour in Europe, including almost all the belligerent capitals, with the exception of Belgrade and Cettinje. His tour embraced Petrograd, Warsaw, Cracow, Lemberg, Kieff, Riga, Vienna, Brussels, also Germany, England, and a few cities in France. In Switzerland, Schelling gave some concerts in aid of the Red Cross for the benefit of the Belgian refugees (of whom there are thousands now in Switzerland in a very deplorable condition), and played also at the Cathedral in Lausanne. During September, Schelling appeared with Mengelberg and the Amsterdam Orchestra.

A very interesting part of the Schelling tour was that he served as dispatch bearer for our American representatives. From The Hague he carried dispatches to our Ambassador in London, from London to the Ambassador in Paris, and from there to the Minister in Berne, Switzerland. After that he worked in the interest of the International Committee of the Red Cross at Geneva.

Schelling expects to spend several months in the United States upon his return here next month.

WHO IS DITTENS?

An English clergyman, writing from Germany in the year 1787, thus describes his musical experiences:

At Dresden and Berlin I heard a great number of children belonging to the colleges sing hymns in a very good style; in many of the churches the chorus children, as they are called, frequently sing about the streets; they wear uniforms according to the order of the different colleges they belong to, some I saw dressed in grey coats with cloaks, others in black cloaks with large grizzle wigs. The operas in Germany are generally of the serious cast, and the most admired composer of this style of music is Dittens.

The experts on the staff of the MUSICAL COURIER, being also "of a serious cast," and anxious to learn, will be grateful to any informant who will tell them who in Buehnenweihfestspiel Dittens was.

Perhaps he is only our old friend Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf trimmed down to Ditters by the chatty clergyman's goose quill and disfigured by the blundering printer into Dittens.

But alas! and alack-a-day! Even Karl Ditters von Dittersdorf is no longer the "most admired composer" of German operas. The world moves, as Galileo remarked.

AUSTRO-GERMAN MUSIC.

Recent musical events in Vienna included the appearances of four orchestras, the Philharmonic, under Weingartner, with von Reznicek's big symphonic tone poem, "Der Sieger," as the novelty; the Tonkünstler Orchestra, under Nedbal; the Konzertverein Orchestra, under Löwe, and the Gesellschafts Orchestra, under Schalk. At the Vienna Royal Opera some of the November and December performances were "Lohengrin," "Aida," "Meistersinger," "Trovatore," "Corregidor" (Wolf), "Barber of Bagdad," etc.

Carlos Sengstock, tenor of the Braunschweig opera, was shot through the lung at one of the Belgian battles, but is expected to recover. He has been made a first lieutenant and decorated with the Iron Cross. Carl Pohlig is temporary managing director and permanent conductor of the Braunschweig Opera. Under his direction the institution has been giving the "Ring" cycle, "Tiefland," "Rigoletto," "The Magic Flute," "Stradella," "L'Africaine," "Barber of Seville," "Daughter of the Regiment," etc. Conductor Pohlig also has led several symphony concerts in Braunschweig.

"Freischütz" and "Abduction from the Seraglio" were the latest productions of the Dresden Royal Opera. The symphony concerts of the Royal Opera Orchestra are being directed by Nikisch, Strauss, Nicodé, Kutzschbach and Reiner. Emil Sauer's playing of the Schumann piano concerto and a vivid reading of Strauss' "Heldenleben" were the principal features of the series up to date.

Hannover is enjoying its symphony concerts as usual, under Conductor Gilles. At one of them not long ago, Elena Gerhardt was the soloist. The Musikakademie sang Brahms' "Requiem."

A "Hindenburg March," by Siegfried Elsner, is very popular throughout Austro-Germany.

Weingartner's new patriotic composition, "In Ernster Zeit," had a successful presentation at Darmstadt.

Kiel has been hearing "Traviata," "Merry Wives of Windsor," "Tales of Hoffmann," "Tiefland," "Martha," "Carmen," "Parsifal," "Uberfall" (Zoellner), etc.

Erich Korngold has completed a musical farce called "The Ring of Polycrates."

Walter Schwarz, the conductor of the Düsseldorf Opera, was killed in the recent battle of Grodek. He was a gifted conductor and a genial personality, who will be greatly missed in the musical circles of Düsseldorf.

Richard Strauss conducted his "Rosenkavalier" at Frankfurt, scoring a big success.

Economically considered, the world is much more interested in that hen at Storrs College, which lays two eggs per day, than in all the output of the cubist composers who bring forth their creations with so much travail and such cosmic cackling.

Why do some ignorant persons affect the use of the word "flautist"? The instrument is not a flaute but a flute, and therefore one who plays upon it is a flutist.

AN INVITATION CONTEST.

"The America Symphony Orchestra, organized for the purpose of impelling high class musical production on this Continent, extends an invitation to American composers desirous of having their compositions played this winter to send a duplicate of their scores by registered mail to the office of the management, 501 Fifth avenue. A technical committee of orchestral members will determine which works shall be performed. The composers will incur no expense, and those compositions which obtain great success in the United States will be set aside so that the orchestra can execute them later on the contemplated trip through Europe."

Thus reads the official notice. It remains only to add that the program of the first public concert of this organization, which is to take place in New York in January, consists of works by Beethoven, Bruch, Wagner, Tschaikowsky, . . . and Carrillo, whose symphony (No. 1 in D major) is to be heard for the first time in America. The composer of this work is the conductor of the orchestra. What Mr. Carrillo thinks of himself and his work may be guessed from the fact that he challenged comparison with the above named gentlemen who are not American composers.

AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY AD.

The following advertisement appeared in 1793, in Bath, England:

Mr. Smith, gentlemen of the Chapel Royal, Mr. Langdon, and Mr. Bond, have each lately offered proposals to the public for publishing sacred music by subscription. Mr. Smith and Mr. Langdon, I apprehend, intend their publications chiefly for choir-service. Mr. Bond, I understand, intends his principally for family devotion, and particularly for the edification and amusement of young ladies on Sundays.

After this glowing tribute to the genius of the trinity of sacred composers, the editor breaks off suddenly and leaves us in the horrible suspense of wondering whether Masters Smith, Langdon and Bond had been mercenary enough to pay for their paragraph, or whether the editor had generously given it to them, in the fullness of his heart. If there is anything deserving of free notices it surely must be sacred music intended for the edification and amusement of young ladies on Sundays. The young ladies of New York, Chicago, Boston, Pittsburgh—and shall we say Philadelphia—will feel a flush of gratitude to us for our defense of their Sunday amusement.

On the sidewalks outside of the Musical Union building hundreds of musicians are gathered every day, according to immemorial custom, in order to negotiate for the "jobs" that turn up. Two policemen are assigned to keep the throng moving, and the manner in which the guardians of the law address and handle the peaceable musicians explains why the blue-coated officials have no severity left when it comes to a question of the treatment of New York's gunmen.

What has become of musical comedy in New York? The only theatrical pieces drawing patronage here at the present time are revues. It is time for revivals of the Strauss, Suppé, Milloecker, Offenbach and Sullivan operettas, to remind the public that there exists a legitimate form of theatrical musical entertainment between a loose-jointed variety show and grand opera.

Knitting at concerts not only is an insult to the performers, but also to the auditors who sit near the knitters. Printed notices in the programs should request the devotees of the needles to ply their pastime at home and not in public places, where persons not interested in stockings have paid their money to hear the music of the masters.

REVIEW OF REVIEWERS.

In the Theatre Magazine there is a symposium of the opinions of critics, managers, authors and composers as to the value of dramatic criticism, but many of the views expressed are applicable also to musical criticism. The critics, as is to be expected, defend their means of livelihood and uphold criticism. The managers, authors and composers point out the worthlessness of professional criticism. Charles Klein holds very correctly that critics either praise or blame, but seldom if ever criticize, and that they are more concerned in the question as to whether the production will be a success than they are in its ethical, moral, structural, or literary value. Mr. Klein, as a dramatic author, calls pathetically for "critics who know and who point out defects in an impersonal way, not critics who display anger or personal resentment." Henry Blossom, a successful librettist, says that "abuse is not criticism, and should never find a place in the critic's column." What must Messrs. Klein and Blossom think, then, of the music critic on the Sun, who, as quoted in the MUSICAL COURIER of last week, accuses Metropolitan Opera House artists publicly of "shouting," "bellowing," "barking," "screaming" and "bawling."

Adolph Klauber, former dramatic critic of the Times, gives it as his opinion that "it is not the province of the critic to determine box office affairs." By the same token, then, it also is not their province to determine or to try to help determine which singers shall have their contracts renewed at the Metropolitan Opera, how long those contracts are to run, who is to be dismissed, how many performances the artists are to sing, what roles they shall appear in, how much they are to receive in the way of salary, etc. There was a tremendous upheaval recently in New York theatrical circles because of the empirical attitude assumed by some of the dramatic critics who regarded themselves as oracles established in permanent positions. Managers, playwrights and actors protested energetically and unanimously to the newspapers at being made targets for the abuse of the critics and victims of "one man's opinion." Instantly there was a change. Two of the best known critics were discharged and the reviews of those who remain are toned down to such an extent that they represent little more than outline news reports of the story of the play, its general trend, and the manner in which it was received by the audience.

Also in music some such stand should be taken by solo artists, managers, opera impresarios and conductors. The amount of nonsense written on music by those New York daily newspaper critics who are not musicians, is appalling. Most of them write not about music, but around it.

A little compendium gathered together now and then by the MUSICAL COURIER shows that our local music scribes do not even agree on questions of fact, aside from questions of taste and ethics, which usually are largely matters of personal preference. This week's bouquet looks as follows:

KNEISEL QUARTET CONCERT, DECEMBER 23.

Evening World.

Mr. Manoly fell in line with the spirit of a regular member of the organization. Mr. (Harold) Bauer, it seemed, did not. In the sonata, for instance, he appeared rather as a soloist than as a partner with Mr. Willeke.

Mail.

Mr. Bauer's enthusiasm, particularly in the last movement often drowned the voice of the cello completely.

Herald.

At times Mr. Bauer, the soloist, got the better of Mr. Bauer, the ensemble player, and Mr. Willeke's playing . . . was dimmed by the brilliance of his fellow artist.

Press.

So, too, Schubert's quintet might have been somewhat more enlivening if Bauer had not kept himself so modestly in the background.

Press.

The music in itself hardly was calculated to keep those visitors wide awake who felt the depressing effect of the steam heated atmosphere in the concert room and the exquisite delicacy and reserve of the players certainly did not counteract that influence, as more than a few nodding heads bore testimony.

Globe.

The great Monday night audience at the Metropolitan was regaled with a performance of "Traviata."

Press.

Many marveled at the eloquence of Frieda Hempel's portrayal, noting with astonishment, among other things, the vocal and interesting refinement she brought to the "Ah, fors e lui" aria, and the emotional fervor she infused into the florid music of the "Sempre Libera."

Sun.

Last evening Frieda Hempel was not in her best voice.

Globe.

The Brahms sonata was admirably performed by Messrs. Bauer and Willeke. Seldom does one hear spirit and finish so delightfully blended in ensemble playing.

Evening Post.

The sonata was splendidly played by Mr. Willeke and Mr. Bauer, whose ensemble work is as admirable as his playing.

Press.

It seemed as if Harold Bauer, in his praiseworthy desire not to assume undue prominence in the ensemble, kept the piano part too subdued. A little more vigor and dynamic stress in his manipulation of the keyboard would perhaps have encouraged the cellist to inject a greater measure of animation and feeling into his playing.

Herald.

In Schubert's quintet Mr. Bauer's ensemble playing was faultless.

Staats-Zeitung.

A true ray of light, this Kneisel evening, with its exulting and yet so wonderfully well contrasted program. One could enjoy the concert in truly con amore style.

"TRAVIATA," DECEMBER 21.

Evening World.

"Traviata" was the bill last night and the attendance was small.

Herald.

Her work, all save the coloratura, was exquisite.

Press.

Now unquestionably the famous soprano was in particularly good spirits yesterday and it may be that she accomplished finer results as Violetta than on any previous occasion.

"HAENSEL AND GRETEL," DECEMBER 25.

Sun.

Miss Braslau as the Sandman deserves special mention for her weak singing.

Sun.

Last night Geraldine Farrar was not in the best of vocal condition.

Press.

Caruso was not vocally at his best.

Tribune.

Miss Braslau sang the Sandmännchen and again displayed her gorgeous natural voice.

American.

Geraldine Farrar's voice was in splendid condition.

Sun.

Caruso's voice was at its best.

"TANNHÄUSER," DECEMBER 25.

Press.

An inspiring performance it was, thanks not only to the invigorating baton of the conductor, but . . .

Press.

Mme. Gadski sang the part of Elizabeth with an eloquence that one has rarely heard equaled before.

American.

A large audience was present.

Sun.

Mr. Hertz conducted with understanding, but succeeded in bringing the sum total of effort only to a level of artistic respectability.

Tribune.

It would be idle to call hers a really poetic conception.

World.

The audience was not large.

A correspondent writes: "In your very striking 'deadly parallels' quoted from the music criticisms in this city's daily papers, why did you not include the contradictions in the 'Euryanthe' reviews? They were very amusing indeed." No doubt, no doubt, but truth to tell, we were frightened by the length of those awesome dissertations, and lacked not only the time but also the interest to read them. If you will take the trouble, dear correspondent, to draw out the "parallels" we shall be glad to publish them in these columns at any time.

FAMOUS OLD TIME SINGERS.

Readers of musical history and biography must have been puzzled to understand the frenzy of enthusiasm which famous singers frequently aroused a century or more ago. The story of Farinelli, for instance, as related by Eastlake, reads like a fairy tale. Philip V of Spain "had a pension settled on Farinelli for life, of 1,400 piastres, or £3,150 per annum ($15,750), and a coach and equipage maintained at the King's expense. His Majesty presented him with his picture set in diamonds, valued at £1,200 sterling ($6,000). The Queen gave him a gold snuffbox with two large diamonds in the lid, and the Prince of Asturias made him a present of a diamond button and loop. He was likewise dignified with the order of Saint Jago by Philip, and by his successor, Ferdinand VI, he was honored with the Cross of Calatrava, an Order in Spain of great antiquity."

The commotion made by Malibran wherever she sang, the impression which Catalani created on Napoleon, who wanted her to remain in Paris, the universal chorus of admiration for Pasta seem impossible to the reader who knows present conditions.

Could a bass singer like Lablache begin the same triumphant career in 1913 that he began in 1813? Could Rubini and Mario carry everything before them now as they did seventy years ago?

Sims Reeves, the famous English tenor, would certainly not now arouse the same storms of applause that were his as late as fifty years ago.

As a matter of fact, the voice has remained stationary, while the orchestra has been developing. Purely lyrical style has given place to dramatic.

We do not pretend to say which is best; we are merely recording facts.

If we find the operas of Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, silly, old fashioned, insincere, is it surprising that the former singers of those operas could hardly delight us now?

They may have been better singers than those we have today. They may have produced a finer, sweeter, more musical tone. But in our modern theatres and accompanied by our huge orchestras, their soft, smooth tones would be far less effective and compelling than they were to our ancestors, who were accustomed to small orchestras and had not yet acquired a taste for the declamatory and dramatic style of the operas we hear today.

No doubt a great many of our singers have sacrificed a good deal of the finer qualities of their voices in their endeavors to gain size of voice and power to compete with the noisy accompaniments of modern vocal works.

Not only have orchestras increased in power but they have also gained a number of instruments whose lovely tones are serious competitors of the finest human voices and superior to the tones of the ordinary singer. Except in the case of quite musically uneducated audiences, the voice of the singer is no longer the only tone that commands attention and makes an emotional appeal.

It must be remembered that the furore created by the singers of a hundred years ago was made before a public that was altogether unfamiliar with the lovely and rich tones of our many voiced symphony orchestras.

Beethoven said that when he thought of a tune he always heard it for an instrument, never for a voice. This instrumental conception of modern music is largely shared by modern audiences. Many musicians, in fact, resent the intrusion of a vocalist at a symphony concert. But this objection, of course, implies no dislike of the voice as a voice, but merely means that beside the voluminous tones of the great orchestras of our times the voice is small. A style of music suitable for the best display of the voice is out of place beside music suitable for the grand orchestra. In other words, modern music is dramatic, and the best singing is lyric.

Flesch Not Dutch.

The attached letter, dated Berlin, November 30, 1914, warrants publicity:

"DEAR SIR—In one of your recent issues I read a notice to the effect that I have become a naturalized subject of Holland. Such a statement is not founded on fact. I have not even thought of giving up my Hungarian citizenship. Any rumor to the contrary is calculated to do me harm, as such a reprehensible course on my part at this sorrowful time would merit condemnation. I would be grateful if your potent pen (my favorite pen, by the way) would undertake to correct the error.

"I could not carry out my American engagements, as I am liable for army service in Hungary whenever called upon. I am sorry that conditions do not permit of my being in your country, where I have made so many dear friends, but I hope to resume artistic and personal relations with America at some happier time in the future. With thanks and regards.

"Most cordially,
CARL FLESCH."

Probing the Debris.

Robert Grau, brother of Maurice Grau, former impresario of the Metropolitan, advises:

"DEAR SIR—The reason why the Century Opera failed is because the management (Aborns) was restricted. By no stretch of the imagination was the policy that which the Aborns had made successful in other years with their own organization.

"The public to whom the Century Company would have appealed strongly never had a chance to hear it. Always it appeared in cities where $5 opera had large vogue, and the prices alone told this public that the venture was second class. After all, showmanship is as necessary in grand opera as in any other 'show.' (There is no other word to express the point meant.)

"Scores of cities of 100,000 or over never hear an opera at all, and when it was desired for the Century to go on tour, immediately it meted out a season of eight weeks to Chicago, where $5 opera alone will pay.

"I believe the Aborns will get a theatre in New York as soon as the Metropolitan closes and give their own opera again. Yours very truly,

"ROBERT GRAU."

Beethoven, the Belgian.

To those French sympathizers who declare Beethoven to be a Belgian and his art "essentially French" it is not inopportune to point out that the composer wrote his "Vittoria" symphony to celebrate the English naval victory over the French (July 21, 1813), and that his "Germania's Wiedergeburt" (to a Treitschke text) beginning with the words, "Germania! Germania! wie stehst du jetzt im Glanze da!" glorified the downfall of Napoleon and the rebirth of Germany.

Rubbing It In.

Rudolph Ganz says that he had a certain haunting fear when his manager, Charles Wagner, advertised him as "the pianist with a message," and that the fear was realized not long ago when an inland newspaper referred to him as "the pianist with a massage."

Ode That Failed

If it were not for that final l, we could make a splendid verse about Przemysl, and Przasmysz.

Musical Slips.

Apropos of amusing misprints, one of our own typesetters made a recent proof notice read like this: "Mrs. King Clark will give a long recital in Boston on the afternoon of January 10," and in the New York Evening Sun of December 26, it was stated that Arrigo Serato "stuffed violin with his father."

The War Muse.

In the London Bystander of December 9, 1914, Basil Macdonald Hastings says that the current English war poetry has been, for the most part, very, very trying and that nearly every verse maker "has fallen heavily." This appears to endorse "Variations" as a column that knows bad poetry when it finds it.

The Lone Spark.

And how is this for really clever war poetry, from the Bystander:

Quoth a Turk as he fled o'er the Bosphorus,
"With Europe we're done; what a loss for us.
But our true friend the Kaiser,
Most noble adviser,
Is keeping a large Iron Cross for us."

That European Concert.

In Bernhardi's "Germany and the Next War," that very sober book which has been foolishly held responsible by unthinking persons for having caused the present conflict, there is this interesting passage: "The mere threat of war and the clearly proclaimed intention to wage it, if necessary, will often cause the opponent to give way. This intention must, however, be made perfectly plain, for 'negotiations without arms are like music books without instruments,' as Frederick the Great said. It is ultimately the actual strength of a nation to which the opponent's purpose yields. When, therefore, the threat of war is insufficient to call attention to its own claims the concert must begin."

Aside from the saying of the flute playing king, the foregoing words are noteworthy because they apply to any other country as well as to Germany. It is a matter for surprise that Bernhardi's violent critics did not stop to consider that most of his book might just as reasonably have been called "France and the Next War," or "England and the Next War." The volume is a highly valuable philosophical and practical study of war, with certain deductions peculiarly applicable to Germany. It is no more the reason for the war now raging, than that "Julius Caesar" causes regicide, or "Faust" encourages seduction.

Let us at least try to be sensible in the matter of "Germany and the Next War" and remember that the clouds of conflict hung threateningly over Europe before it was published and from the present outlook of things will darken the heavens periodically long after Bernhardi and his book are forgotten.

Soccer and Symphony.

This letter is received from Ernest Bystrom, of Brooklyn, N. Y., under date of December 17, 1914:

"The other night I met a 'society woman' who almost apologized for her son, a college boy, because he was so fond of music. She hastened to inform me, though, that the boy also is a football player, so you see, he is no molly-coddle.

Now here is an interesting subject which hardly would need a discussion in Germany. The Germans certainly show both moral and physical courage (when did they ever apologize for being musical?)—and their physical courage is amply proven in the present war where musicians make up quite an army of their own.

"Speaking of football, I read lately a speech made by Lord Kitchener, I think, where he despaired of the football playing youths in England who had very much disappointed the recruiting office by not showing up. In the future when English military instructors attempt to benefit young Britannia from lessons taught by this war, suppose that music be made a medium instead of football to put 'ginger' in English boys?

"I think that music has helped the Germans wonderfully, and it certainly does not need any excuses as a tonic."

Violin With Horn Obligato.

Would you, if you were a violinist, consider it a compliment, to have a newspaper write that your playing sounds like a calf in distress? Roy Young, of Lexington, Ky., evidently is proud of a notice to that effect, for he sends to "Variations" the following clipping from the Lexington Leader of November 29, 1914:

"A party of Lexingtonians journeyed to the country yesterday to watch Roy Young, the violin virtuoso, in some of his nature studies for which he has become noted. As a demonstration of his powers, Mr. Young secreted himself behind a rock fence and proceeded to imitate a calf in distress. The notes of the violin were so plaintive that a herd of cattle that were a little more than a quarter of a mile away at once took notice and it was only a few minutes until they were all hurrying toward the hiding place of Mr. Young. Some fifty or more cattle were attracted in this manner until the whole herd stood just over the fence from Young."

Accompanying the foregoing was a moving picture snapshot of the naturalistic fiddler seated on the lee side of the fence with the cow herd on the other. What might have happened had Mr. Young and his bovine audience been on the same side of the fence interests us exceedingly.

Syncope?

In the New Zealand Sporting and Dramatic Review, "G" String, an unusually able musical commentator, remarks waggishly: "A Dr. Heydemann mentions among the many military merits of music that 'the soldier does not notice that he is dying while he is keeping step to ragtime music!' This is by far the severest criticism of ragtime music that I have yet read."

Heartfelt Sympathy.

"Cast your paragraphs upon the waters and they will return to you after many days, credited to some paper in Akron, Okmulgee or some such place."

—Ohio State Journal.

What Are Opera?

We belong to those opera goers who find it impossible to laugh at the laughable episodes in "The Magic Flute," to emote at the emotional passages in "Euryanthe," or to relige at the religious happenings in "Parsifal." But we fear that we shall be inclined to dig at some of the most dignified passages in "Fidelio" when it reappears shortly on our local boards. In other words, our operatic bump is ingrown, for we often enjoy a musical stage work because it has a good theatrical plot and attractive tunes. One of the best operas we know is Elgar's "The Dream of Gerontius" and one of our favorite oratorios is "Parsifal." "The Magic Flute" should have been a cantata, "Fidelio" a symphony, and "Euryanthe" a symphonic fantasy with chorus. LEONARD LIEBLING.

Discrimination.

"It's all wrong!" said the man with the red nose and a doleful manner of speech. "All wrong!"

"What's the trouble?"

"The music in my neighborhood has driven me to drink. And now they're going to put additional taxes on the drink and let the cornet, the piano and the bass drum that did the damage go free!"—Washington Star.

Got His.

"Did the play have a happy ending?"

"You bet it did. Someone in the gallery hit the villain squarely in the face with a tomato."—Houston Post.

MANAGERS' FORUM.

Manager and Critic.

One of the problems of the ages is the defining of the critic's attitude toward the artist and the public. It is not only a delicate matter but seemingly a most hopeless one. Strange to say, while the subject has been pounced upon the artist as well as critic, one can hardly hear the manager's voice in this universal Chorus of Discontent.

Whether the cause is purely neglect or the perpetual lack of time, it matters little, but one thing is certain, that the manager is as vitally interested in this controversy as the artist, critic, or the patient public. At least one is bound to come to such a conclusion if the suit brought by Professor Geo. D. Haage, a prominent musician and local concert manager against the Reading Printing Co. is to be read as a much meaning message on the wall. This case is of the utmost importance to every local concert manager and artist's representative—not to speak of the artist and critic who are playing the leading parts in the tragi-comedy.

Case of Importance.

Here we have a case where the plaintiff, Professor Haage, avers that the critic whose "write up" was instrumental in doing great damage to his as well as his artist's business interests, had not attended the concert in question—at least not in body, but only in spirit, and judging from the "write up," in a very bad spirit at that. What may or may not have been the casus belli of this legal bombardment would be hazardous to state without awaiting final judgment in the case.

Whatever it may prove to be, one thing is certain: this case will at least be instrumental in awakening interest in a most important phase of concert work. It will define to some extent the music critic's rights and the extent of his responsibility in performing his delicate duty to the public, his paper, and, if you please, the artist.

Daily Press and Musical Art.

This important phase of musical art has been treated most flippantly by the daily press whenever the subject has been brought to its attention. Not long ago the Chicago musical profession remonstrated against a music critic's method of "writing up" musical events. The protest brought forth editorial comments that caused one to look askance toward the honorable editorial chair with a quizzical look toward the gentleman holding down that job and this is said even though the MUSICAL COURIER seemed to back up the Chicago paper in the matter.

Every Man to His Trade.

Is it not the boast of all "great" dailies that they secure the pen of eminent experts and authorities, respectively, for their Baseball, Football, Railroad, Stock Exchange, Business Columns, Good Housewife, Matrimonial Wisdom, Maidens' Advisor, etc.? These dailies boast of the prices they pay for their services of the experts. If a new bridge or great building is completed do they send an expert on preserving dill pickles to "write it up?" No, that would put the paper in jeopardy. Has "Beatrice Fairfax" (Who does a Woman's Column or something of the sort) ever written up the construction of the new German guns? No, not yet. This quizzing could be kept up ad infinitum, but it would be of no avail, except to prove that if the standards required from the music critics of our daily papers were as high as those that are expected from our concert artists, most of our dailies (with all respect to honorable exceptions) would have to insert "want advs." for new music critics.

Criticisms and Conscience.

Not long ago a Chicago cellist was spoken of as an artist who publishes his criticisms "as they are" regardless of good or bad content. One cannot help admiring the spirit prompting the deed, taking it for granted, of course, that the spirit is genuine. But how about the manager? Would he allow the noble spirit to influence him to that extent? Speaking in managerial terms a criticism can prove to be a good or bad advertisement.

Now we come to the point that is the missing link of this article. If a criticism is a bad advertisement, will it not be of as grave concern to the manager as it will prove finally to be to the sensitive artistic side of his client, and if the safety of business interests rests on the manager's shoulders, is he to be influenced by the mere beautiful spirit of his artist who will consider every critic a law unto himself, regardless of whether the dictum is "absent treatment" or inspiration drawn from the closing measures of his last number which the critic has perchance caught on the fly?

Weigh these matters on the scale of justice in an unbiased manner, and you will find it impossible to achieve an equilibrium.

The above lines are intended to point out the vast and insurmountable difficulties that arise from the compulsory relationship of critic and manager, even if the manager is not tied down to one community but has the blessed opportunity of seeking variety of criticisms elsewhere.

To Come Back.

On the other hand, take the case of Professor Haage who depends to a great extent on the hearty cooperation of the local press in his splendid work in behalf of the musical cause of his city. How is Professor Haage going to escape the ravaging effects of these "absent treatments?" Here we have a problem well worth considering for although the Reading case is but an exception, yet we should all benefit from the far reaching lessons it teaches.

Unfortunately the managers' cooperative and protective association that would assert its power on such occasions—that much needed association—exists only as a vision with a few managers of broad spirit. To be sure, of all the various professions and trades, the concert managers are the only ones among the representatives of legitimate business enterprises that can boast of this unique state of affairs. This mythical association would reach out a helping hand to Professor Haage so as to establish a precedent that would give them a legal foundation for enacting such legislative protective measures as might astound the boldest of dreamers.

A clearer understanding would be brought about between artist, critic, audience and the manager, and the beneficial effects of such a house cleaning could hardly be figured out in dollars and cents, for its influence would be more far reaching than the credit and debit accounts.

It would not result in a perfect musical Utopia, but undoubtedly it would help the manager to strike a new spark of faith in the general public not only in their own managerial activities, but also in the judgment of the critic. A new and higher standard would evolve, restricting the activities of critics who do not take their profession seriously. In most cases, alas, their own musical knowledge cannot be considered in a serious vein.

What Is a Critic?

We cannot expect or compel a daily in a small city to secure the services of such competent critics as those whose authoritative work has been of such help in serving the cause of the muse in some of our large music centers, but it could certainly be brought about that if the man or woman sent out by a newspaper to report a concert does not know enough about music to give an intelligent and authoritative account of happenings, he or she should not be allowed to exploit their hobbling humorous or satirical talent, but should get down to business and tell in plain English how the audience received the artist. If the local paper cannot secure the services of an intelligent musician for such occasions, the only just "write up" will be a graphic account of how the audience at large was pleased.

The Law and Criticism.

The critic may object very strongly to the rigid hand of the law meddling with his delicately constructed mental apparatus, but that does not necessarily mean that the critic is right and that his methods cannot be improved upon by an influence other than his own. Would it not be a great advantage to all concerned if the law would define a gentle borderline which would serve as a timely reminder to the philosophically, pedagogically or satirically inclined critic to use up his surplus storage of sulphur (tagged as above) in detached musical articles. Why is it necessary to prove his theories and voice his grievances, genuine or imaginary, at the expense of artist, manager and the public? If the critic blessed with the literary bump and surplus thoughts cannot resist the compelling force to voice his views, why not treat us to them in musical treatises or books as some of our eminent critics have contributed to musical literature?

The right of voicing the critics' views on every possible phase of our musical activities should not be curtailed by any means, but we must remember the natural laws that demand recognition and reassurance. Those laws tell us that too much "ego" finally will prove the undoing of any altruistic work, no matter what its source may be.

After all is said, the critic is called upon by the public to give those who were not present at the concert an intelligent account of the event. In usurping this occasion, or privilege, for the preaching of his own sermons seems hardly just to the artist, public, and, pray do not forget—the manager, that manager to whom the unbiased intelligent account of the critic serves as the very rocks wherewith he will build the foundation of the career that his artist, good, bad or indifferent, has entrusted him with.

Art and System.

Whenever the word "system" is mentioned in connection with musical art and its exploitation it is followed by a threatening murmur of "beware of commercialism." To be frank, a bit of sanely applied "system" would prove a blessing. The belligerents may easily be disarmed by these simple questions: "Was it not the much becursed 'system' that helped you to build up your technic, be your forte violin, voice, piano or composition?" "Is it not the wicked 'system' that makes art a paying proposition, aside from the glory it may or may not bring?" "Is it not the bugaboo 'system' that brings forth order from the chaos of things regardless of spiritual or material origin?" The laws of nature serve as a warning to all who disregard its importance and power.

The Reading case should serve as the first chapter of a great movement for order in the chaos of concert enterprises. The movement should have the hearty support and cooperation of every critic, artist and manager of high ideals and of our powerful musical press. Comments and suggestions would be welcomed on that vital topic.

NEMO.

PITTSBURGH NOTES OF INTEREST.

Pittsburgh, Pa., December 24, 1914.

With Vera Barstow, violinist, and Boris Hambourg, cellist, as assisting artists, Mrs. Lawrence Litchfield gave the first chamber music concert of the season here recently. Both these artists are too well known to readers of the MUSICAL COURIER to require an introduction. Suffice it to say, that the concert under such competent direction could not fail to be a genuine success.

Charles Boyd, teacher of organ and piano, has found it necessary to move to 431 Wood Street, Pittsburgh, where his school occupies practically an entire floor. Hollis Edison Davenny, Theodore Rentz, Geraldine Damon and other musical lights are also teaching at this address.

Adah Sampson Thomas, one of Pittsburgh's leading teachers of voice, numbers among her successful students, Martha S. Steele, of whom she certainly has every reason to be proud. Mrs. Thomas has had a very busy December.

Carl Bernthaler the pianist and conductor has been appearing at the Morning Musicales given at the Twentieth Century Club, where his sympathetic work and marked musical temperament are making a strong appeal to appreciative music lovers.

Caspar P. Koch, city organist, gave a recital in the North Side Carnegie Hall, recently, playing numbers by Wolstenholme, Debussy, Buck, Schubert, Humperdinck, d'Ambrosia, Dell'Acqua and one Old English. He was assisted by Kathleen Wood Neal, soprano.

With James P. McCollum conducting, the Mozart Club recently gave an excellent performance of Hoffmann's "Cinderella," written for chorus and three solo voices. The soloists were Vera Kaighn, soprano; Christine Schutz, contralto, and Charles Granville, baritone. Miss Kaighn is soloist at the First Presbyterian Church, where her work as well as her various concert appearances, have made her a general favorite with her fellow townsmen.

Mary B. Wildermann, the concert pianist, who has been appearing in concert in various parts of Europe for the past two or three years, has returned to America and is now at her home in Pittsburgh. She has been successful in recitals, having appeared with orchestras in Germany, Austria, the Orient and elsewhere.

Sara F. Troutman, formerly manager of Lucile Miller, the soprano, Ida Mae Heatley, contralto, as well as other vocal artists who reside here, is devoting her time to the study of child portraiture at the Jamieson studios in East End, Pittsburgh. During the winter, Miss Troutman will pursue a similiar course of study in New York.

William Stevenson, the vocal teacher, whose studio is now located at 209 Ninth street, has an unusually large class of students with him this year. His earnest aid and personal interest in each of his pupils do much to make him a popular pedagogue.

Under the direction of Reese R. Reese, the vocal teacher, the Studio Club of this city gave a concert on Thanksgiving evening, November 26, at the West End M. E. Church. The assisting artists were Mary Reese Wilson, contralto; Miriam Stauff, soprano; Eva Page, mezzo-soprano; Elizabeth Florian Evens, pianist; J. C. Moyle, violinist, and Reese R. Reese, baritone. The audience was large and voted the affair a delightful one.

During the intervals of her concert and recital appearances, Elsie de Voe Boyce, the pianist and accompanist is accepting a limited number of pupils.

The Recital Quartet of Pittsburgh, of which Edith Granville Filer is the soprano soloist, recently gave a novel program at the Wilkinsburgh High School. Folksongs, madrigals and quartets were included among their numbers, which were warmly welcomed by an appreciative audience.

As a pleasant departure from the ordinary run of recitals, Morris Stephens, the vocal pedagogue presented his advanced pupils in scenes from "Faust," "Martha," and "Elijah," at the Pittsburgh Conservatory Hall. The affair was greatly enjoyed by an interested audience.

ROCHESTER ATTRACTIONS.

Tuesday Musicale's Important Position in Local Musical Affairs—Two Orchestras Give Concerts.

Rochester, N. Y., December 24, 1914.

The Tuesday Musicale is now in full operation carrying out its many musicale activities for the year. Interest in the work of the club is great and much confidence seems to be shown in the ability of its present administration in the arranging of programs, in the selecting of artists, and in the completing of business transactions.

This musical organization, besides arranging for regular bimonthly programs by its own artists from November to May inclusive, sustains a large Students' Club and participates in many extension programs throughout the city at large. The Student's Club, organized some three or four years ago under the administration of Jeanette Fuller, as president, is proving an efficient means of giving its members the poise and musicianship necessary for public appearance and for entrances into the Tuesday Musicale proper.

The time of the extension committee of the Tuesday Musicale is fully taken up at present with the many concerts that have been requested. These programs are arranged according to the nature of the demands and the musical needs of the different sections of the city. It might be explained that the members of the Musicale donate their services for these programs, and the city, through the Board of Education, donates the use of the school buildings, janitor service, lights, advertising, and so forth. Last year between forty-five and fifty such programs were given with an average attendance of about four hundred.

In addition to the above activities, the club has arranged for three evening concerts by outside artists during the year. Harold Bauer opened this series with a piano recital recently, and the Flonzaley Quartet is to appear in January. The third concert is not yet announced.

The club officers are as follows: President Mary Chappel-Fisher; vice-president, Mrs. S. F. Ettenheimer; recording secretary, Mrs. Walter Bentley-Ball; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Charles Hooker; treasurer, Mrs. James H. Boucher; chairman Student's Club, Mrs. Charles Garner; chairman extension committee, Elizabeth Casterton.

Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert for the season last Tuesday night before a large audience. Ludwig Schenck, the conductor, is much to be commended for his persistent and painstaking efforts in helping to organize such an orchestra in our midst. The members of the orchestra are chiefly amateur musicians who play for the love of music and for a knowledge of orchestral routine. Concerts are given for the benefit of the public, no admission fee being charged. The following program, which would do credit to any symphony society, was rendered: Suite No. 3 D major, Bach; symphony No. 4 C minor, Schubert; prelude from "La Vierge," Massenet; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner.

Hambourg-Warner Concert.

John A. Warner presented at the Genesee Valley Club last Thursday evening the first of his three concerts assisted by Jan and Boris Hambourg. These three artists have given to Rochester, during the last two years, two series of chamber music recitals, which have been much appreciated. The Rachmaninoff trio "Elegiaque," op. 9, D minor, aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the audience, though the rest of the program, the Brahms sonata, op. 78, G major played by Jan Hambourg and Mrs. Warner, and the Volkmann violin concerto, op. 3, A minor were given a beautiful rendition by the performing artists. Mr. Warner is to be congratulated upon the contribution which these programs are making to the musical advancement of the city.

Concert by Rochester Orchestra.

The Rochester Orchestra, under the leadership of Herman Dossenbach, gave at the Lyceum Theatre, on Monday evening, the third of its season's concerts. The chief feature of the program was the appearance of David Hochstein, a young violinist, who is a native of Rochester. Mr. Hochstein won great applause at this, his first public entrance into the American concert field and convinced his audience that he has sufficient artistry and command of technic to be ranked among the leading violinists. Rochester has, and will have, reason to be proud of this young artist.

NEW ORLEANS OPERA AND CONCERTS.

New Orleans, La., December 16, 1914.

On account of a storm on the Gulf of Mexico, the steamer Abanarez, bearing the members of the Sigaldi Opera Company, has been delayed twenty-four hours, and as a result the première of the operatic season, which was to be held on December 17, has had to be postponed until December 18. The personnel of the company is as follows: Sopranos—Adda Navarette, Maria Pilar de Rocha, Angele Blanco, Angelina Insusa; contraltos and mezzo sopranos—Adriana Delgado, Andreina Baraldi, Eva Guerero; tenors—Michele Sigaldi, Giuseppe Gaudenzi, Edmondo Anaya, Macario de la Torre, Leopoldo Perrini; baritones—Angelo R. Esquival, J. Torres Ovando; bassos—Antonio Saldagno, Alessandro Panciera, Rodrigo Roldan. Director, Comm. Armando Buratti.

Whitehill in Recital.

Clarence Whitehill appeared at the Athenæum on December 7 in a song recital, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. In spite of the inclemency of the weather, the attendance was very large. Mr. Whitehill's program was well chosen and included among its numbers Zandonai's "Visione Invernale," which the singer delivered with rare taste. He was much applauded throughout the evening and was forced to repeat several of his songs. Charles Albert Baker was a skilled assistant at the piano.

French Opera Artists Reported Dead.

News has been received stating that the war has claimed two of the most popular artists who have ever appeared at the French Opera House, the tenor Fontaine and the baritone Combes. Fontaine was leading tenor during the season 1910-11 and won the admiration of the opera goers not only by the beauty of his voice but also by the subtlety of his lyric and dramatic art. His Sigurd, Raoul, Des Grieux, Canio, to mention but a few of his roles, have remained lasting memories. Immediately upon returning to France he was engaged for first tenor roles at the Grand Opera of Paris, a post which he held successfully until the European conflict. Combes, while almost always cast for minor roles, gained many admirers for the sympathetic quality of his voice and for his general conscientiousness. For four consecutive seasons he was warmly welcomed back here. Fontaine, according to report, was wounded in the arm and died after its amputation. Combes, it is said, was killed while acting as telegraph operator.

Mme. Jomelli in Vaudeville.

The most prominent feature of last week's bill at the Orpheum was the singing of Jeanne Jomelli. This artist was booked to sing here some years ago as soloist with the Dresden Orchestra, but, owing to an accident to her hand, could not appear as scheduled. Mme. Jomelli was enthusiastically acclaimed during her week's engagement in this city and deserved the plaudits given her.

Benefit Concert at Opera House.

The benefit concert for the English, French and Belgian Relief Fund was one of the brilliant events of the past week. To Victor Despommier, who had full charge of the artistic management, a great deal of credit is due. Those who graciously gave their services were: Mmes. C. B. Moore, L. Mundy, Feodor-Camoin, Eugenie Wehrmann-Schaffner, T. C. Buckley, F. W. Bott, Misses Violet Hart, Mary Moloney, Selika Daboval, S. W. Lawrence, S. Levert, L. Lavedan, G. Lavedan, M. Norra, and Messrs. A. Kernion, Paul Jacobs, J. B. Wynne, H. Wehrmann, J. Delery, L. R. Maxwell, C. Arny, W. Arny, J. B. Follet, R. Salomon, A. Freiche, C. Pinsky, G. Ferrata, and L. Mundy.

St. George's Choir to Entertain.

St. George's Choir will be heard in two entertainments which are to take place in January. Tonight this meritorious organization is to meet at the Louisiana Restaurant for a big jollification, at which several of its most talented members will participate in the vaudeville part of the program.

Polyhymnia Musicale.

The Polyhymnia Circle, Theresa Cannon-Buckley, directress, gave its second musicale of the season last night. The reading of "The Raven," by Bernard Hanley, accompanied at the piano by R. Emmett Kennedy, was one of the most enjoyable numbers on the program.

Junior Philharmonic Officers.

Officers of the recently organized Junior Philharmonic are: Eleanor Luzenberg, president; Hilda Phelps, vice-president; Helene Louise Israel, second vice-president; Sylvia Norman, secretary-treasurer.

Pals.

By Constance Clarke.

You are a senseless thing, you piece of wood,
And yet you are of all the world so dear
A friend—and daily, hourly, when I would
I need but look at you to feel him near.

Sometimes I smile, when I am in the room
Alone with you—you seem to know so much
About me—ah, how often in the gloom
You've sprung to tone and music at my touch.

You are my medium, you senseless thing,
And in the heart of me you stand alone.
I know that I have but to bid you sing
To hear his voice across the telephone.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

"Traviata," December 21.

Frieda Hempel's gloriously fresh voice, her suave phrasing, fluent coloratura, and sincere histrionism, make her assumption of the role of Violetta a thing of sheer delight and help to freshen the rather faded old score into a work pleasant to modern ears, accustomed as they are to sterner stuff in an opera house where Strauss, Wagner, Mozart, and Puccini form part of the regular repertory. The Hempel triumph of last week was one of the most decided which she has scored here and many old timers were unable to recall a finer performance of the tuberculous heroine.

Pasquale Amato also in splendid fettle gave his familiar sympathetic rendering of the elder Germont and sang with mellow-toned appeal.

Luca Bota did Alfredo with communicative fervor in vocalism and action. He has fitted himself admirably into the Metropolitan ensemble and conquered his clientele with a dispatch that shows his unusual powers in the way of artistic gifts and personal magnetism. The rest of the cast included Minnie Egener, Marie Mattfeld, Angelo Bada, etc.

Giorgio Polacco always conducts as though his heart and soul are in his work and he makes no exception even in such an ancient score as "Traviata." Polacco's baton art and enthusiasm were a musical treat in themselves.

"Aida," December 23.

Verdi's best opera remains his most popular one—a fact which stamps the public as not such a bad music critic after all. Arturo Toscanini led the grand old airs, and they were sung with tremendous spirit by Marie Rappold (who replaced the indisposed Mme. Destinn), Margarete Ober, Giovanni Martinelli, Pasquale Amato, Angelo Bada, Lenora Sparkes, Giulio Rossi, Adamo Didur, etc.

Mme. Rappold long ago established herself as an able exponent of the dusky slave princess and she has lost none of her tonal plenitude and polished voice manipulation in singing. It is a pleasure to hear such pure bel canto and to see it combined with acting so dignified and so intelligent.

Mme. Ober's Amneris was colored passionately and consequently she gave the correct reading of the part. Her delivery of the music was effected authoritatively and arrestingly.

Giovanni Martinelli has developed into a fine Radames, intense, virile, and yet sufficiently romantic. His "Celeste Aida," the Nile scene, and the final duet were given forth with lovely tonal effect and the utmost smoothness in presentation.

"Manon," December 24.

Massenet's delightful music and the undying charm of Abbe Prevost's great love story are the elements that help to keep "Manon" in the repertoire of the opera houses of the world. The work is not one of intellectual profundity or of overpowering artistic purpose, but it is full of ingratiating and well made music and offers unusual vocal scope for the possessors of flexible voices and a fluent style in phrasing. The score is a model of delicate coloring and refined musical sentiment and represents the best operatic measures in the fertile Massenet output.

Geraldine Farrar and Enrico Caruso are effective exponents of the leading roles in "Manon," the soprano, chiefly because of her bewitching appearance in the picturesque garb of the period, and her appropriate coquetry in bearing and demeanor, and the tenor because of his wondrously timbred voice, his exquisite use of it, and his sincere portrayal of the lovesick, faithful, chivalrous, aristocratic Des Grieux. Caruso looked exceptionally well in his grey silk doublet and hose.

Antonio Scotti was not to be compared for an instant with Dinh Gilly, who has made the role of Lescaut peculiarly his own. It is to be hoped that he soon will be released from detention in Europe and return to the Metropolitan. Leon Rothier was unusually good as Le Comte des Grieux. Other parts were filled capably by Lenora Sparkes, Sophie Braslau, Maria Duchene, Maria Savage, Albert Reiss, Andrea de Segurola, etc. Arturo Toscanini was the conductor and the orchestra played with ravishing quality of tone.

"Haensel and Gretel," December 25 (Matinee).

A huge Christmas Day audience greeted the revival of Humperdinck's tuneful opera, and many children were noted among the delighted auditors.

Marie Mattfeld did her customary and long admired role of Hänsel and renewed her success therewith. A newcomer was Elisabeth Schumann, as Gretel, whose "soubrette" performance fitted the part to a nicety. She was full of arch humor and naive playfulness and made every note of her singing count to the utmost. It was feared that Bella Alten's loss as Gretel would be irreparable, but Fräulein Schumann, with her thoroughly enjoyable rendering, has set all such fears at rest. Albert Reiss' inimitable version of the Witch convulsed the onlookers with its grotesque drollery. Lila Robeson was a tuneful Gertrude and as the Sandman and the Dewman, respectively, Sophie Braslau and Mabel Garrison contributed some sweet and well considered vocalism. Otto Goritz was the Peter of the occasion and clowned in his accustomed manner.

Following the opera came several lovely dance divertissements, chief among which were the doings of Rosina Galli, who gyrated, and floated, and pantomimed with wonderful grace, lightness and poetry. She is without question one of the best prima ballerinas in the world.

"Tannhauser," December 25 (Evening).

Friday evening brought the revival of "Tannhäuser," which some of the ultra-Wagnerians affect to despise, but the general public has taken to its heart warmly and enduringly. The melodious numbers have lost none of their fascination and the tale, because of its inherent dramatic qualities and strong construction, holds the interest as potently as of yore.

An excellent cast presented the work, with Jacques Urlus as an intelligent and warm blooded representative of the titular character. His singing left nothing to be desired in the way of finely rounded tone, and adaptation of color to text requirements.

Johanna Gadski's Elizabeth is an art rendering of the best kind, plastic, authoritative and fulfilling alike the aesthetic and musical requirements. Hermann Weil's Wolfram is one of his striking characterizations. The music lies perfectly for him and he gives it uncommonly finished promulgation. Carl Braun, as the Landgraf, is another correct piece of casting, for he limns the figure with all the large dignity and deep sentiment it calls for.

Margarete Matzenauer made an impressive Venus, whose personal blandishments were in ample evidence and whose persuasive singing surely would have held a less wavering swain than Tannhäuser.

Decidedly praiseworthy parts of the ensemble were added by Paul Althouse (Walther), Carl Schlegel (Biterolf), Max Bloch (Heinrich), Basil Ruysdael (Reinmar), Lenora Sparkes (Shepherd) and the four pages, Louise Cox, Rosina van Dyck, Minnie Egener and Veni Warwiek. Alfred Hertz conducted vigorously, at times far too much so.

"Carmen" December 26 (Matinee).

Another overflowing house greeted "Carmen" on Saturday afternoon, although this was the fourth performance this season of Bizet's masterpiece. Judging from the row of ticket purchasers that, in spite of the very cold weather, lined Broadway near the opera house for hours before the curtain rose, "Carmen" has lost nothing of its old time attraction for the public.

Carnso as Don Jose was in fine voice, and acted with spirit.

Geraldine Farrar made an acceptable Carmen, delivering the role in a satisfying manner.

Lucrezia Bori is well suited to the part of Micaela. She enacts the winsome and modest girl in every detail and her vocalism has the charm that fits the role.

That genial artist, Pasquale Amato, is not ideally cast in the role of Escamillo, even though he expends upon it all his enthusiasm and art. There are many characters in this distinguished baritone's repertoire in which he shines with more lustre than in that of the Toreador. However, when all is said and done, who is there among the baritones of the Metropolitan Company, who is eminently fitted for the Escamillo interpretation?

The minor roles were well sung by Mabel Garrison as Frasquita, Sophie Braslau as Mercedes, Reiss as Doncaire, Bada as Remendado, Rothier as Zuniga, and Defrère as Morales. The ballet was very attractive, especially the artistic dancing of Rosina Galli. Toscanini conducted.

Metropolitan Sunday Concert.

Arrigo Serato, the "guest" of last Sunday's concert (December 27) at the Opera, won a tremendous ovation after his temperamental and very musicianly performance of the Wieniawski violin concerto in D minor and scored his second big hit of the evening in Bach's air on the G string and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen." Encores were demanded and graciously accorded. Serato's fine art seems to grow with each new demonstration he vouchsafes here, and no violin master of recent memory has obtained a deeper hold on the affections of the New York public than this sterling artist unquestionably enjoys at the present time. He is a player alike for the musician and the layman and therein lies the secret of his quick and remarkable American success.

Carl Schlegel gave a well considered reading of the "Evening Star" song from "Tannhäuser" and in doing so revealed a voice of much intrinsic beauty and smoothness. Songs of Schubert, Schumann, and Kaun, showed that Schlegel is conversant also with the finer graces of the Lieder art.

Johanna Gadski, a prime favorite at the Metropolitan concerts, as she is too at the opera performances, made an excellent choice in the "Inflammatus" from Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The number lies well for Mme. Gadski's voluminous and warmly timbred organ and she gave it with moving effect. Later in the evening the house rose at the singer when she contributed her thrilling version of Schubert's "Erlkönig," and after a song by Reichert, wound up her group with the old German folk song "Stille Nacht, Heilige Nacht," in which her voice reflected all the fervent hope and deep Heimweh felt by every patriotic expatriated German at this sad time.

The orchestra played Thomas' "Mignon" overture, Borodine's "Sketch of the Steppes," Moszkowski's "Serenade," and Meyerbeer's "Torch Dance," No. 3.

BROOKLYN ACADEMY.

"Magic Flute," December 26.

Saturday evening, December 26, "The Magic Flute" drew a large audience to the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The cast included Herbert Witherspoon, Frieda Hempel, Emmy Destinn, Rita Fornia, Anna Case, Paul Althouse and Johannes Sembach. Mr. Witherspoon's portrayal of Sarastro was masterly and the basso was in excellent voice. Owing to Mr. Witherspoon's concert engagements he had arranged with the management of the Metropolitan Opera Company not to appear before January 15 so that he could fulfill these engagements. There was such a demand, however, for his operatic services that the management requested him to resume his operatic work before the expiration of his leave of absence. This occasion marked Mr. Witherspoon's first appearance in opera this season. Johannes Sembach won merited honors in the role of Tamino; Paul Althouse was entirely satisfying as the First Priest; Frieda Hempel sang the two arias of the Queen of the Night beautifully and aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. Emmy Destinn gave her familiar delineation of Pamina. Alfred Hertz conducted.

Mozart's opera was magnificently staged, the numerous scenes setting forth in impressive fashion the unusual capacity of the Metropolitan Opera Company's art and mechanical forces. The audience was large and appreciative and it was a brilliant event.

Topeka Talent Performs "Messiah."

Topeka, Kan., is congratulating itself on a recent excellent performance of "The Messiah" given by a chorus of 200 voices and an orchestra of forty-nine musicians, comprised entirely of local talent. Horace Whitehouse, dean of the department of fine arts of Washburn College, Topeka, is given the whole credit for the organization of the chorus and orchestra and for the creditable performance.

The oratorio was given December 16 in the spacious Auditorium, which is equipped with a four manual pipe organ.

About 3,000 people are said to have been in attendance, making the largest audience gathered for such an event in many years at Topeka.

As a result of this performance, a demand was made by the public and participants that the Topeka Musical Art Society be made permanent and that performances be given at regular intervals. Plans have been perfected accordingly and regular spring and fall musical events are now assured.

The soloists at "The Messiah" performance were Gertrude Rennyson, soprano, of Boston Opera Company; Lucy Hartman, contralto, of Chicago; George Deane, tenor. of Kansas City; Charles E. Lutton, bass, of Chicago.

Success of a Buck Pupil.

Katherine Galloway, soprano, scored a gratifying success recently when she appeared in a concert at Fairfield, Conn. On December 22, she sang in Paterson, N. J., and again received her full meed of praise. Miss Galloway, who is an artist-pupil of Dudley Buck, the New York vocal teacher, has a bright and true soprano voice and her interpretations display serious thought and deep musical insight.

On December 27, she sang in Newark, N. J., and the middle of January she will appear in New York with the Beethoven Society. She will sing at Springfield, Mass., on January 23, and has a February engagement in Philadelphia. Other appearances of this talented young artist will be announced later.

Maigille Pupils Heard.

An extremely critical audience was invited on Tuesday afternoon, December 22, by Helen Maigille to listen to a demonstration of work done by her American School of Bel Canto, at the headquarters of the institution, 134 West Eighty-second street.

Mme. Maigille holds very decided views on the question of vocal instruction and she believes very properly that next to publishing her theories for the benefit of the singing world (many thoughtful essays from Mme. Maigille's pen have appeared in the MUSICAL COURIER) the most potent way to prove the value of her contentions is to permit her pupils to perform for small bodies of discriminative listeners whom she bids to her studio particularly for that purpose.

Last week the singing was done chiefly by Dorothy Maynard, a young soprano who revealed a real lyrical voice of remarkable purity and sweetness, handled it with exquisite skill and taste, dictioned with uncommon finish in Italian, German, French and English songs, and put into all of her renderings a degree of musicianship and temperamental warmth as exceptional as it was gratifying. In numbers by Brahms, Franz, Huë, Ronald, Kramer and Puccini ("Madame Butterfly") Miss Maynard carried her hearers away and won their enthusiastic plaudits. She is sure to be heard from in a larger way soon in the concert field, where she has a number of public engagements, chief among which is that of soprano soloist at the music festival to be held this spring in Nashua, N. H., under the direction of E. G. Hood. Previous to her placing herself under the artistic supervision of Mme. Maigille, Miss Maynard was a well known comic opera prima donna, but, as she expresses it, "I never really knew much about the true meaning of singing until I began thorough studies under my present teacher."

Gréta Stoeckl, a coloratura soprano with a light voice of pleasing quality, delivered the "Romeo and Juliet" valse and other selections with facile tone emission and good command of phrase.

Mme. Maigille was the recipient of warm congratulations for the excellent showing of her well trained disciples.

Mark Twain's Daughter Charms Audience at Song Recital in Little Theatre

Displays Remarkable Powers of Interpretation and Feeling for Emotional Values—Two Compositions of Contralto's Husband Admired.

If Clara Gabrilowitsch had sung only Brahm's "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" at her recital in the Little Theatre yesterday afternoon she would have proved herself an artist of very unusual gifts.

In the whole literature of the lied there is nothing that gives more beautiful, more refined, more profoundly moving expression to the tragedy of disconsolate love and longing than this song of the German composer. But neither is there in the whole literature of the lied anything that offers a greater interpretative problem for the imagination and intelligence of the singer. To find exactly the right emotional medium, exactly the right vocal modulations, for a condensed lyric drama, so intensely human, so heart-searching in its pathos, yet so simple, so chaste, so lofty in sentiment and style; that is the difficulty.

But the daughter of Mark Twain with her famous husband, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, assisting her at the piano, was successful where so many of her predecessors who could boast more remarkable voices and greater reputations had failed most dismally.

Living Embodiment of Character.

By penetrating deeply into the spirit of text and music, she made herself for the time being the living embodiment of the poetic character through whom the author and composer conveyed their message, finding wellnigh perfect expression, and reflecting it in the varied inflections of her voice and the play of her features, for that subtle quality, the combination of virginal modesty and intense grief which distinguishes this song of Brahms from all others.

However, Clara Gabrilowitsch, who was heard to far better advantage vocally in the intimacy of the Little Theatre than in the wider spaces of Aeolian Hall, revealed her interpretative powers in many other songs besides "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer," which she had to repeat. Indeed, there was hardly one number on her list that failed to bring out clearly the American contralto's intelligence, her feeling for emotional value, her musical grasp, her command of diction, her sense of dramatic emphasis—in short, her skill in carrying home the meaning of the composer.

Certainly it speaks well for her that she managed to concentrate the attention of the audience on herself when the exquisitely elaborated accompaniments of her talented husband, who was represented as a creative musician by two selections—a finely felt song entitled "Die Wasserfahrt" and an effective work entitled "Naehe des Gellebten"—claimed so much admiration.

Impressive Contributions.

Among the singer's most impressive contributions were Schumann's "Der Sandmann," which she gave twice; the same composer's "In's freie," to which she brought a good deal of warmth and temperamental vigor; Brahm's beautiful and rarely heard "Wehe, so willst Du mich wieder," which she sang with contagious spirit and dramatic force, and "Dort in den Weiden"; Tschaikowski's "Die Thraene bebt," which also deserves more frequent hearing, and the irresistibly energetic and buoyant song of the Shepherd Leol from Rimsky-Korsakoff's fairy opera, "Spegourotchka." Her programme included Schubert's "Die Allmacht," "Halt" and "Am Grabe Anselmo's"; Schumann's "Minnelied," Brahms's "Der Gang zum Liebchen," Rachmaninoff's "Der Fliederbusch," Horatio Parker's "Love is a Sickness" and "Once I Loved a Maiden Fair" and Mrs. Beach's "The Year's at the Spring." As an encore and the end she offered Paisiello's "Tregiorni."

NOTES.

Rosa Olitzka will give a song recital in the ballroom of the Midway Gardens on Sunday afternoon, January 3,

Through the courtesy of Dr. F. Ziegfeld, president of the Chicago Musical College, a program of opera has been arranged for the members of the Illinois Club, Tuesday evening, January 19, when the second act of Bizet's "Carmen" and the second act of Flotow's "Martha" will be given by the College School of Opera.

Georgia Kober, pianist, appeared in recital in Mayville, Wis., on December 26.

Mr. and Mrs. George Hamlin are enjoying the Yuletide season in Chicago.

Arthur P. Thomas, pianist, will be the soloist with the Ballmann Symphony Orchestra at the North Side Turner Hall on Sunday afternoon, December 27. He will play the first movement of the Beethoven concerto in C minor with orchestral accompaniment. At present Mr. Thomas is director of music in Tennessee College at Murfreesboro, Tenn.

Last Sunday afternoon the Agnes Nering Singing Society gave a charming entertainment at its Christmas party at St. Stanislaus Church.

At the seventh concert of the third season of the Sinai Orchestra, which will be given Sunday evening, December 27, Letitia Gallaher, soprano, will be the soloist. Arthur Dunham, conductor of the orchestra, beside directing selections by Verdi, Dubois, Dvorak and Kreisler, will also play an organ solo. The soloist will sing Micaela's aria from "Carmen," and a group of songs.

Boston Symphony and Other Notes.

The ninth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, December 25 and Saturday night, December 26. The program was of a lighter character than most of those heard here by the orchestra.

John P. Marshall, organist, was soloist for the concerts,, which he opened with César Franck's chorale in A minor for organ alone. Mr. Marshall is an artist and musician of no little merit and his reading of the interesting work was very enjoyable. Volbach's symphony in B minor was given a first hearing, but the composition aroused little attention in spite of the conscientious reading by Dr. Muck and his players. Interesting by way of contrast were the Bach "Symphony" or "Shepherd's Music" from the "Christmas Oratorio" and the Liszt "March of the Three Holy Kings," from "Christus." The music was ideally suited to the time but sounded strangely placed on our symphony programs. However it proved uncommonly effective and won prolonged applause. Weber's "Freischütz" overture finished the program.

A BUSY SOPRANO.

Ethelynde Smith, the Portland, Maine, soprano, is spending the holidays in Boston visiting her many friends here. Miss Smith announced some of her concert plans, and discussed musical matters at length when visited by the MUSICAL COURIER representative the day before Christmas. The young soprano has had a very successful season thus far and the general demand for her services continues to increase at a surprising rate. Several engagements for this immediate vicinity are booked for the latter part of the month, prominent among which, is a re-engagement with the Fortnightly Club at Bath, Maine, on December 30. January 8, she will appear at the annual Masonic concert in Portland, and then leave for a series of engagements in Eastern New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The month of February will be spent in the Middle West where Miss Smith will fill engagements booked at the early date by the Briggs agency of Chicago. Two Chicago appearances will figure on this Western trip.

V. W.

GLUCK-ZIMBALIST RECITAL ANNOUNCED.

Alma Gluck and Efrem Zimbalist have arranged a program of short pieces for their joint concert at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, January 3. The Russian violinist will play the Handel E major sonata; an air by Bach; "Les Pappillons" and "Musette," by Couperin-Liebersohn; vivace, Haydn-Auer; an air by Goldmark; scherzo by Tschaikowsky; "Chanson Triste," by Kalinnikoff, and "Tambourin Chinois," by Kreisler. Mme. Gluck will sing numbers by Rameau, Handel, Haydn, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Horsman, Zimbalist, Cadman, Massenet and Braga. The concert is arousing much interest, and promises to be one of Boston's most important joint attractions of the season.

R. E. Johnston to Manage Isadora Duncan.

Isadora Duncan, the celebrated dancer, is to make her first appearance in America since 1911, at the Metropolitan Opera House, Tuesday afternoon, January 12. Seven of her pupils and a complete symphony orchestra will assist.

Following her New York performances, Miss Duncan and her pupils will appear in Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, the tour being under the direction of the New York manager, R. E. Johnston.

Noted Artists Sing Tietjens' Songs.

Paul Tietjens gave a musicale at his New York studio on Sunday, December 27, assisted by Mariska Aldrich and William Hinshaw. The program included works by Schumann, Mozart and other of the classic composers, and a number of compositions by Mr. Tietjens, who is himself an eminent composer. The first number was a song cycle entitled "The Sailor's Sweetheart," Tietjens, consisting of five songs associated by the poetic content. They were sung by Mme. Aldrich who delivered them with much brightness and charm and added by the excellence of her interpretation to the success which they won by their undeniable beauty.

Following this Mr. Hinshaw sang a set of songs including one by Tietjens, "Remorse," which proved to be a work of intense passion. Mr. Hinshaw's fine baritone was effectively employed in the expression of the great depth of feeling which Tietjens had infused into this number. Hinshaw's fine humor and splendid vocal technic were especially noticeable in "Männer suchen stets zu naschen," Mozart, his masterly delivery of which was greatly enjoyed.

Mr. Tietjens proved himself to be a pianist of fine attainments by playing a rhapsody of his own and Chopin's scherzo in B minor. The program concluded with a set of songs by Tietjens sung by Mme. Aldrich of which "My Sweeting," "The Dead Flower," and "Woodland Love Song," were perhaps the most successful. Tietjens is already well known as a composer of great talent, and this reputation was fully confirmed upon this occasion. He possesses a great wealth of melody and a very fluent technic, and his songs are not only modern but singable and excellently written for the voice.

Harold Bauer Plays.

At Aeolian Hall, last Sunday afternoon, December 27, Harold Bauer gave what he called "A Recital of Popular Piano Classics." An attentive audience listened to Bach's chromatic fantasia and fugue, Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2, Schumann's "Carneval," Chopin's berceuse and A flat polonaise, op. 53, Schubert's A flat impromptu, Liszt's D flat etude, and an arrangement of Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

The Bauer style of pianism has grown too familiar to need lengthy description at the present time, and last Sunday it gave pleasure as usual. This concert exponent never violates the artistic conventions and consequently his recitals offer nothing that is sensational or meretricious. For teachers and students a Bauer appearance always demonstrates much that is impressive.

Boston Symphony New York Programs.

At both of the forthcoming concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, January 7, and Saturday afternoon, January 9, Fritz Kreisler is to be the soloist. Thursday evening he will play Mendelssohn's concerto and Saturday afternoon Bruch's "Scotch" fantasie. The orchestral numbers for Thursday evening are Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture" and "Siegfried Idyll." Saturday afternoon they are Beethoven's eighth symphony. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, the "Pastorale" or "Shepherds' Music" from Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" and the "March of the Three Holy Kings," from Liszt's "Christus."

Anna Case Scores as Papagena.

Anna Case, the American soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, won a really brilliant success as Papagena in the "Magic Flute," Tuesday, December 22, at Philadelphia, when she sang the role on a day's notice and without an orchestral rehearsal. Her performance won much applause and praise from the press.

Musical Deaths.

Eduard Kremser, Viennese composer and conductor, died in the Austrian capital recently, aged seventy-six.

In Berlin, the very talented youthful Hungarian pianist, Ernst von Lengyel, passed away a few weeks ago. He was only twenty-one.

Elena Gerhardt in New York.

Elena Gerhardt arrived in New York last week on the steamship Ryndam.

ST. LOUIS NOTES.

St. Louis, Mo., December 24, 1914.

Next to the last concert of 1914 by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra was given on Friday afternoon, December 18, at the Odeon. The program opened with Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, which was given a splendid reading by Conductor Zach and his men. The second number was Beethoven's overture, "Coriolanus." Arrigo Serato, the Italian violinist, played as the closing number Beethoven's concerto in D major, op. 61. This remarkable artist gave a fine rendition of the concerto, and as an encore played a fugue by Tartini-Kreisler, with piano accompaniment performed by Homer Samuel. The same program was given on Saturday evening.

The seventh popular concert of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra occurred Sunday afternoon, December 20, at the Odeon. The assisting soloist was Pasquale Tallarico, pianist. The program contained: overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; ballet music from "Feramors," Rubinstein; concertstück for piano, op. 79, with orchestral accompaniment, Weber; "Dance of the Camorrists," from "Jewels of the Madonna," by Wolf-Ferrari (first time); overture, "Le Rol L'a Dit," Delibes; waltz, "Bad'ner Madln," Komzals. Encores were numerous. Mr. Tallarico has a charming personality and pleased the audience immensely with his playing. As an encore Liszt's "Liebestraum" was given.

The Morning Choral Club gave its annual Christmas recital on Friday morning, December 18, at the Pilgrim Congregational Church. The program opened with the anthem "Angels from the Realms of Glory." Mrs. A. D. Chappell and Olivia Steudle sang "Angel of Light," by Whitney Combs. Edward J. Dykstra sang "Like as the Heart Desireth," by Allitsen, and "What Star Is This?" by Stewart. Three Christmas carols were given by the club in a most exquisite manner. Mrs. J. J. Kessler sang "The Christ Child," by W. Combs, Lulu Kunkel Burg playing the violin obligato. Then the Morning Choral Club sang in a most effective manner "When I View the Mother Holding." The audience joined with the club in the singing of a Christmas hymn by Rev. H. Edmund Sears. Charles Galloway was the conductor and Rodney Saylor the accompanist.

The Chaminade Choral Club, of Webster Groves, a suburb of St. Louis, gave its first public performance of the season Friday night, December 18, at Holy Redeemer Hall to a large and musical audience. The club was assisted by John Barnes Wells, tenor, and Pasquale Tallarico, pianist. The concert opened with an "Evening Prayer in Brittany," by Chaminade, from whom the club took its name. A vocal arrangement of "Anitra's Dance," from the "Peer Gynt Suite," Grieg, proved pleasing. Mr. Wells sang a number of solos, much to the pleasure of the audience. Mr. Tallarico played compositions from the works of Bach, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Liszt and Chopin. The recital was brought to a close by Mr. Wells and the club singing "While by My Sheep," by Max Spickler, and "A Winter Night Fantasy," by Paul Bliss. George A. Bluthardt was the conductor and Alice Pettingill the accompanist.

Power of the Speaking Voice.

[Lura E. Abell in the Bridgeport (Conn.) Standard.]

One of the most potent factors in the power of personality is the voice. In it are reflected and focussed the temperament, the mental poise, the humane qualities, the physical stamina and the nervous tension of the speaker.

The strong nature finds expression in forceful, vibrant tones and if the voice be well modulated, the self-control of the individual is apparent; whereas the strident, nasal voice belongs to the provincial mind that speaks twice before it thinks, or again to the overworked person whose nerves are constantly drawn too taut. The sympathetic nature commands pleasing lights and shades of tone, while a colorless voice betrays a lack either of feeling or of physical strength. Inarticulate utterance is accompanied by indolence or a lack of concentration and a breathless haste in speaking shows overstrung nerves.

Since most rules work both ways, a better poise in the mental and physical forces may be gained by cultivating the speaking voice. Unless there is some physical obstruction, the average individual may acquire clear utterance and a well-pitched, agreeable voice, and by so doing gain control in a corresponding degree of the entire organism. For the concentration that is necessary to control the power of speech cannot fail to have a reactionary influence upon the mental and physical powers of the speaker. So every effort in this direction accomplishes a two-fold benefit, giving increased power over the person addressed and greater self-control.

Americans have been much criticised for their disagreeable voices. But it is encouraging to note that in these days of free rural libraries and improved transportation facilities the voice of the oldtime "way daouwn Easter" is more and more rarely heard. The American voice, however, still lacks the range and tone-color that make for power as well as beauty of expression and greater attention to the acquirement of these qualities would bring rewards well worth the effort.

Some Famous Infant Prodigies.

[From the Newark, N. J., Star.]

The good people of Skowhegan, Me., have an infant prodigy among them, who hails from Boston. It is no doubt out of the ordinary for a boy to read at two and one-half years, and to memorize Gray's "Elegy" and expound Leviticus at five. Nor is it given to every youngster at the latter age immediately to repeat the words and sing the tune of every song he hears. But in no respect is the Boston-Skowhegan phenomenon unique.

Thus there was Torquato Tasso, who began to talk at six months and who had international renown as a writer before he was eight. Thomas Chatterton learned to read from a black letter Bible before he was four years old; at eight he would read and write original compositions all day; at eleven he contributed to periodicals and wrote the duologue of "Elinour and Juga," and at less than eighteen he died with a name among the literary giants of his time.

Thomas Young, the British scientist, was a fluent reader of standard works before he was two years old, and John Philip Baratier, the German savant, mastered German, French, Latin and Greek at five, and added Hebrew at eight. Nobody knows when Thomas Lawrence learned to read and draw, but at four years old he used to entertain callers with long quotations from classic poets, or, if they preferred, he would draw their portraits, and at ten years he was a leading professional portrait painter to the nobility and gentry.

Cowley learned to read at two or three and was the author of an epical romance before he was nine. Gordoni wrote a comedy before he was eight, and at about the same age Elizabeth Barrett was reading Homer in the original. Beaumont wrote tragedies at twelve. De Beauchateau before he was ten years old ranked among the foremost French poets of his day and was the literary lion of the court of Louis XIV.

Precocity among artists has been so common as almost to be the rule. Besides Lawrence, already mentioned, there was George Morland, who at four was exhibiting sketches at the Society of Artists; there was Landseer, who drew well at five, and there was Canova, who before he was nine was carving altars out of Carrara marble.

There have been mathematical and scientific prodigies, too. Isaac Newton before he was fairly in his 'teens was constructing windmills and water clocks and invented an automobile. Truman Henry Safford before he was nine years old had prepared an almanac, himself working out all the astronomical details.

Mozart was a harpsichord player at three, a composer of merit at four, a concert player at five, and at seven a singer and performer on the harpsichord, organ and violin. Handel at seven was playing the clavichord, the organ, the violin and the oboe, and before he was ten was composing a motet every week and an occasional trio for two oboes and a bass. Schumann was a composer before he was seven, and Mendelssohn played in public at nine.

For sheer precocity, however, two of the Wesleys perhaps lead the list. Charles Wesley was a serious student of music and a good performer at four years old. Samuel Wesley at three was a competent organ player, with especial gifts for improvisation; at four years old he memorized the entire oratorio of "Samson," and at eight he himself composed an oratorio.

Something of a prodigy on other lines, too, was Jonathan Edwards, who at ten years wrote a treatise on "The Immateriality of the Soul," and two years later sent to a European correspondent a scholarly essay on "The Wondrous Way of the Working of Spiders."

BETWEEN PAUSES AT THE SAENGERFEST.

The Liberated Mind.

[From the Bridgeport, Conn., Standard.]

Fritz Kreisler, in describing his impressions on the Austrian battlefield, said that during twelve days he did not take off his clothes. He slept in the wet grass with only a cloak for covering, but he was unconscious of the cold and, exalted and strengthened by the intimate brotherhood that existed between himself and his regiment, he felt the inspiration of a wonderful flow of energy. "Every sense seems sharpened," he said. "One is uplifted immeasurably and feels nothing but enthusiasm with never a trace of fatigue."

After being wounded this Austrian violinist, whose genius has delighted and uplifted the world in times of peace, was sent home. His wife gives the other side of the picture. "When I finally saw him limp off the train," she said, "he had a three weeks' growth of beard, which was more gray than black, and was hollow-eyed and cheeked. He had lost about twenty pounds in weight and limped from a bruised nerve center in his leg."

An American editor, Leonard Liebling, whose literary genius is enriched by a wonderfully spontaneous flow of humor, recently apologized for having neglected to reply to a letter written to him more than three years ago. The revelation that the editor gave of himself in his explanation was worth much more than a reply to the letter itself could have been. It came, he said, when he was suffering severely from the effects of mental and physical strain brought on by conditions outside his control. For a time all personal letters had to be disregarded, in order that his impaired energy might be concentrated on the work that must be done. There were weeks when he stuck to his desk, harassed inwardly by the fear of a mental breakdown, while outwardly he maintained apparent composure.

"But how could you, under those circumstances," he was asked, "continue to write as you did for the paper? No one could have imagined from your writings that you were not feeling the sparkle of good humor that bubbled up in every paragraph. How could you make forced writing sound so spontaneous?"

"Did it?" was the reply. "Then it must have been the force of habit."

Both the musician and the editor are the possessors of minds that have been liberated, trained to respond to the call of the moment and to forget self in the greater need. When one has attained that height the extraordinary is unconsciously accomplished.

BOSTON HAS A QUIET MUSICAL WEEK.

Yuletide Season Marked by Usual Dearth of Melodic Events—Handel and Haydn Society Gives Annual "Messiah" Performances.

11 Poyls on Road, Fenway,
Boston, Mass., December 23, 1914.

The week, as announced in my last letter, was marked by a scarcity of musical events. Last Saturday's operatic concert, the two symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday, and the two performances of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society on Sunday and Monday, December 20 and 21, were the only attractions of moment. A fortnight ago the MUSICAL COURIER representative was inwardly blessing (?) his fate while attempting to attend two and even three concerts at the same time, but just now he has naught to do but entertain fond anticipations of what the latter part of the season holds in store.

OPERATIC CONCERT.

The operatic concert at Symphony Hall last Saturday afternoon was an enjoyable affair and attracted a good sized audience. The singers were Raymonde Delaunois, contralto; Giovanni Martinelli, tenor; Leon Rothier, basso; all three of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, and Elisabeth van Endert, soprano, of the Berlin Royal Opera House. The artists sang in a highly satisfying manner and pleased all those present. Elisabeth van Endert made her first Boston concert appearance on this occasion, and made a good impression. She will be heard this season in an extensive concert tour now being arranged by Charles A. Ellis.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY SINGS "MESSIAH."

The one hundred and thirtieth performance by the Handel and Haydn Society of "The Messiah" was given at Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, and a repetition of the work occurred on Monday night at the same place. Conductor Mollenhauer handled his combined forces in an authoritative manner and brought out the many beauties of the work. The chorus was effective throughout, and the solo voices, composed of local talent, as has always been the rule in past years, were heard to splendid advantage. A notable incident of the Sunday night performance was the admirable way in which the solo basso, Willard Flint, handled his part. Mr. Flint's voice is unusually rich, and the singer proved himself worthy of the high artistic standing he commands in the oratorio and concert world. Seldom it is that teacher and pupil appear in the same concert, but here was the exception, for one of Mr. Flint's star pupils, Mr. Stone, was heard in the solo tenor role. Mr. Stone won much favor from the large audience, and he well deserved it all. The young man already has become quite prominent here and his teacher has every reason to feel proud of him.

ETHELYNDE SMITH'S SUCCESS.

Ethelynde Smith, a soprano well known to New England audiences, gave a song recital at Colby College, Waterville, Me., on Tuesday evening, December 15. According to various press notices at hand the soprano again won her usual success, for Waterville claims never before to have had so fine a musical treat. The program offered by Miss Smith displayed much versatility of style and good taste in selection. Wolf, Loewe, Sinding, Fuentes, Willeby, Rubner, Cadman, Salter, Gilberte, Beach, Ware, Hopekirk and Garrison were among the many composers represented.

VICTOR WINTON.

PHILADELPHIA NOTES.

Philadelphia, Pa., December 26, 1914.

A brilliant performance of "The Magic Flute" by the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York was the principal event on this week's calendar. The cast included: Sarastro, Carl Braun; Königin der Nacht, Frieda Hempel; Pamina, Johanna Gadski; Erste Dame, Vera Curtis; Zweite Dame, Rita Fornia; Dritte Dame, Lila Robeson; Erster Knabe, Lenora Sparkes; Zweiter Knabe, Louise Cox; Dritter Knabe, Marie Mattfeld; Tamino, Jacques Urlus; Sprecher, Carl Schlegel; Erster Priester, Max Bloch; Zweiter Priester, Julius Bayer; Papageno, Otto Goritz; Papagena, Elizabeth Schumann; Monostatos, Albert Reiss. Alfred Hertz conducted.

Each year the annual commemoration service in St. James Church, under the direction of S. Wesley Sears, for the First City Troop of Philadelphia City Cavalry is attracting wider attention. The service was held this year at four o'clock on the afternoon of December 14. The Haydn anthem, "The Heavens are Telling" was the principal number given by Mr. Sears' well trained choir. Other numbers were Warwick Jordan's Te Deum in C and Henry Smart's Magnificat in B flat.

Wassili Leps, who has been conducting two rehearsals a week with the Philadelphia Operatic Society in preparation for the production of Victor Herbert's "Serenade" at the Metropolitan Opera House on January 21, relinquished his baton to the composer himself last week. Mr. Herbert will conduct the final rehearsals as well as the actual performance. There will be 175 singers in the chorus and the solo parts will be taken by Edward C. Coffrain and Mrs. Emily Stokes Hagar.

On Wednesday evening of this week, Nelson A. Chestnutt, tenor, gave a recital before a large audience in the Combs Broad Street Conservatory of Music.

Mme. Olga Samaroff is announced by Charles Augustus Davis for a piano recital in the Academy of Music, on Thursday evening, January 7.

The Lecfson-Hille Conservatory of Music closes for the Christmas vacation on December 23, and reopens on January 4.

The Treble Clef, under the direction of Karl Schneider, is almost ready for the midwinter concert on January 27.

The Metropolitan Concert Quartet, Abbie R. Keely, soprano; Clara Yocum Joyce, contralto; Nelson A. Chestnutt, tenor; John J. Joyce, Jr., bass; and William S. Thunder, accompanist, have been engaged for concerts at Shenandoah, Milton, Carlisle, New Bloomfield, Wilmerding, Atglen, Newport, and Pocomoke City, Md. One of the most important concerts of this organization is the Christmas festival at Drexel Institute, this city.

Of all the artists who annually appear in Philadelphia musical halls, none is more welcome than Fritz Kreisler. In view of the reports of his death which stirred his admirers during the early weeks of the war, he was doubly welcome this year, and his concert at the Academy of Music on the afternoon of December 16, attracted one of the largest recital audiences ever gathered in the Academy of Music. Carl Lamson was at the piano.

H. P. QUICKSALL.

Werrenrath Conducts "The Messiah."

Under the spirited direction of Reinald Werrenrath, the University Heights Choral Society of New York gave an excellent rendition of Handel's oratorio, "The Messiah," on Tuesday evening, December 22, in the auditorium of the New York University. This concert was the first in the Campus Concert Course, which is now in its fourth season and the appreciative audience proved this course to be a popular one.

With Mr. Werrenrath as conductor and director, this body of less than a hundred singers is rapidly advancing to the fore among the societies of a similar nature in New York and vicinity. Mr. Werrenrath strives after quality rather than quantity and the former is the hallmark of this society. The singing upon this occasion was excellent, the tonal balance being generally well preserved. In this regard, special credit should be given the tenors, who in point of numbers were much less than the other voices.

In addition to an orchestra which gave able assistance throughout the evening and which did some excellent work in the "Pastoral" symphony, the soloists were Gertrude Marchant, soprano; Emma Roberts, contralto; William Wheeler, tenor, and Frank Croxton, bass. Unfortunately, Charles A. Baker, who was on the program as organist, was unable to act in that capacity owing to the difference in pitch between the organ and the instruments of the orchestra, which made it necessary to dispense with the former.

In the selection of the soloists, Mr. Werrenrath proved himself an excellent judge. Miss Marchant displayed a voice which is truly soprano in its quality. Her work in the quartet numbers was particularly enjoyable. Miss Roberts sang the part allotted to the contralto soloist with a depth of feeling that stamped her a serious artist.

As the tenor soloist, William Wheeler was all that could be desired. His conscientious endeavor and thorough musicianship were much in evidence, his singing being especially good in the aria "Behold, and See," although it is difficult to discriminate when all the work was so fine. Mr. Croxton was the bass.

Mr. Werrenrath's readings were broad and dignified and thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the occasion.

On Tuesday evening, January 19, the second concert in this course will be given by Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, who will be heard in song recital. Mr. Werrenrath's recent success at Aeolian Hall, New York, proved him to be a popular artist.

Marcella Craft's Champions.

Marcella Craft's art has won a host of admirers wherever she has appeared. At Kansas City she made so deep an impression that the Musical Society passed a resolution, unanimously condemning the somewhat indifferent notice of the concert which had appeared in one of the papers. This certainly is a most unusual course for a musical club to adopt.

Miss Craft's managers report that laudatory letters and comments reach them from all sides, and they are particularly happy to have received a letter from one of the most eminent promoters of music on the Pacific Coast, Sara D. Harker of Palo Alto, Cal. Miss Harker is the president of one of the leading girls' colleges on the coast; she is also secretary of the Peninsula Musical Association.

Miss Harker writes as follows:

I have just been up to the city (San Francisco) today to hear Marcella Craft, and I am completely carried away by her art and her exquisite voice. She is even beyond my expectations of her, and I have always felt she was the coming star.

Yours cordially,
(Signed) SARA D. HARKER.

Thuel Burnham's Engagements.

Thuel Burnham played in Birmingham, Ala., on December 27, and from there came immediately to New York for ten days to superintend the work of the pupils who were granted scholarships by various New York clubs, as has already been reported in these columns. He leaves New York again on January 8 and plays almost daily until the first week in February when he returns to New York for the Sherry concert, February 7. He also makes a flying trip to New York to be here January 16 for the Rubinstein Club concert, and leaves the same evening for Burlington, Ia. Reports from every place where Mr. Burnham has appeared show that he is having unfailing success, and he is constantly receiving new bookings.

"Is your daughter going to practise on the piano this afternoon?" asked the neighbor. "Yes, I think so." "Well, then, I'd like to borrow your lawn-mower. I've got to cut the grass sometime, anyway."—Otago Witness, Dunedin, N. Z.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S HISTORY OF MUSIC
—By—
J. C. MACY
New Edition, price, $1.25 postpaid

Though prepared for "young people" this book will be found interesting by all who do not care to study the longer histories, dictionaries, etc. It gives, in necessarily condensed form, valuable information, and is written in an easy colloquial style, free from technicalities. For this new edition much material has been added as was needed to indicate the trend of latter-day composition and the biographies of the great masters have been supplemented by sketches of modern composers who have earned a universal reputation.

BOSTON NEW YORK

SAMAROFF RE-APPEARS

Critics Affirm Art Broadened and Deepened

Olga Samaroff

NEW YORK

(New York Evening Post)

OLGA SAMAROFF A WINNER.

. . . Her return to the stage is occasion for sincere rejoicing, for, while there are undoubtedly too many recital givers in the country, especially this season, artists of her rank are scarce now and likely to remain so. She gave much pleasure by her poetic playing of half a dozen Chopin pieces, a nocturne, two preludes, a valse and two of the delightful Polish songs arranged by Liszt; also by a daintily Viennese rendering of the Schubert-Liszt "Soirees de Vienne," and Liszt's "Rakoczy March," not to speak of the extras and encores she had to add. But the greatest treat of the afternoon was her playing of MacDowell's "Eroica" sonata.

After she had played this piece, a former pupil of MacDowell, and a composer himself, W. H. Humiston, remarked that he had heretofore considered the "Eroica" inferior to the "Tragica" and "Keltic" sonatas, but that Mme. Samaroff's reading of it had made him change his mind. A finer tribute to the charm of her playing of the "Eroica" could not be given, for Mr. Humiston knows MacDowell as few do. It was, indeed, an entrancing reading of this inspired work; one which revealed the alternate grandeur and tenderness of the music, its elflike lightness here, its fierce passion there, its longing, its nobility, its originality, and its Amercanism, as perhaps no one but MacDowell himself had previously revealed these qualities.

(New York Times)

There was a large audience and much applause. Mme. Samaroff has refined and ripened her art since she has played in New York. She has still the fleet and brilliant finger technic that was notable in her playing in years gone by. She uses it with much delicacy, with brilliancy at times, yet not with an obvious purpose of impressing with brilliancy alone.

There was much that was fine in her playing of Edward MacDowell's "Sonata Eroica," a sincere, deeply felt, and admirably planned interpretation, thoroughly sympathetic with the composer's moods. The "elflike" scherzo was brilliantly played, and the elaborate figuration that is so much used in this sonata was presented with remarkable clearness and facility throughout.

(New York Press)

Mme. Samaroff played with a versatility as great as the variety of numbers she presented.

The MacDowell "Sonata Eroica" was perhaps the finest playing of the afternoon. She brought to the fore all the fiery feeling and the elusive tenderness embodied in the sonata. The fourth movement, with the directions "fiercely, very fast," left nothing to be desired. . . .

Evidently there is no limit to the artistic possibilities of Mme. Samaroff's playing, for each of her numbers was performed with finish and much charm.

(New York World)

MME. SAMAROFF PLAYS THE PIANO LIKE A MAN.

To play the piano like a man is the ambition of every feminine musician who has selected that instrument to help her win a career; but few ever realize this desire. One of the few is Olga Samaroff, whose exceptional resources until yesterday, had not been displayed to the public of this city for several seasons.

Beethoven's D minor sonata, which was used to open the recital, is a composition well suited to a performer whose technic is fluent and reinforced by a brilliant style. Such a one, Mme. Samaroff gave it with a clarity truly delightful; nor did she overlook the opportunities for many contrasts in power and quality of tone.

The four small pieces that followed—all of them of the eighteenth century—were performed with a limpidness and delicacy that moved the pianist's hearers to redemand the very brief though admirable Martini gigue. At this point Mme. Samaroff gave evidence of both her strength and her understanding of effectiveness by bringing forward the "Turkish March," from Beethoven's "Ruin of Athens." She interprets it with breadth and authority, never once faltering in the octave and chord playing which ask so much of wrists and fingers.

Mme. Samaroff's playing of MacDowell was very sympathetic, and her Chopin almost equally so. The performance she offered was of such high and well balanced an artistic order that she will be welcomed here whenever she chooses to return

(New York Staats-Zeitung)

(Translation.)

There are not a few women artists to whom every real friend of music would wish a husband who would remove them from the field of art, but Olga Samaroff, who since her marriage has hidden herself away in her home life, has been missed, and the renewal of acquaintance with her yesterday afternoon caused the purest pleasure not only to me, but to a very large audience in Carnegie Hall.

Mme. Samaroff is one of the most refreshing and precious artistic personalities among the women who are striving for the prize. Healthy to the core, and yet with a certain feminine coquetry where it is permissible; again possessing almost masculine authority and power, and yet without the empty "hojotoho" of the piano Walküre; intellectual, individual, intensely sensitive, always within the boundaries of the aesthetically beautiful, but without becoming effeminate or weak; possessing much varied color, and yet avoiding the crass extremes. Her touch was inexhaustible in finesse and caresses; her left hand is a second right hand; her phrasing interesting; she possesses that light, loose wrist for swift octaves and a nobility and purity of finger technic that one seldom meets with. All this breathes blooming personality, which raises all she does far above the ordinary.

Unfortunately, I must deny myself commenting upon all the delights of her program. The Beethoven sonata was a treat, especially the beautiful solemnity of the slow movement. In several compositions of Graun, Benda and Padre Martini, these graceful old masters, she put in the most delicate, and sometimes humorous, touches. MacDowell's unfortunately so seldom heard sonata "Eroica," with its changing moods and contrasts, she awoke to dramatically moving effect, especially the second movement, was a regular "Midsummer Night's Dream" of mysterious, elfin witchery. A perfect horn of plenty of rare charm was brought by her Chopin playing, and when her fingers glided through the Schubert-Liszt "Soirees de Vienne" one seemed to see carpets of flowers springing up.

The public gave the artist a rousing reception. Mme. Samaroff is one of the finest artists I know. If a king's crown was upon my head, or the millions of great captains of industry upon my conscience, I should have Olga Samaroff play to me every day.

BOSTON

(Boston Evening Transcript)

In aspect and in accomplishment, Mme. Samaroff has come back to our concerts much as she left them. She was the same pianist when she appeared first to the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday; she was the same pianist to hear when she had finished her appointed and her extra numbers; and her hearers, as of old, were loud in applause of her. Not one of her familiar talents seemed lessened or dimmed—her roundness of transparent tone, her clearness of articulation, her crispness of touch, her fleetness and evenness of finger, her command of large but never strident powers, her keen sense of rhythm and climax, of flowing melody, running arabesque of contrasting mood and voice.

She played also the heroic sonata of MacDowell. . . . He who listened to Mme. Samaroff yesterday might not doubt the large and exalted voice of the music in the first movement and in the finale; the fancy that plays through the scherzo; the deep songfulness of the adagio; the beauty that fills this song and that plays again out of the contrasting passages. . . . From end to end, the listener heard the sonata as "absolute music," eloquent as such and as eloquently played.

(Boston American)

Samaroff is one of the most charming personalities that sit at the piano. She has been in retirement for several seasons, and it is a pleasure to hear her again.

(Boston Herald)

She has long been admired as a deft and polished executant, brilliant in bravura. . . . MacDowell's sonata provided Mme. Samaroff with many opportunities to display her own distinctive gifts. As in the sonata, so in the pieces by Chopin and Liszt, there was poise, delightful clearness in swift or in complex passages, intelligently musical phrasing, variety in touch.

(Boston Daily Advertiser)

In Mme. Samaroff we have an artist thoroughly familiar with the possibilities of her art and endowed with a digital facility, rapid and easy, equal to coping with the difficulties of such technically formidable compositions as those of Chopin and Liszt. Guided by a musical intelligence sufficiently alert to grasp clearly the structure of a work, and to present it with nice appreciation of its rhetorical effects, she depicts contrast, light and shade, the balance and flow of music as a whole.

(Boston Post)

She has ripened as an artist since her previous concerts here. She had always an enviable poise and an intellectual grasp of her subject matter rare among virtuosi. She had a fleet technic. Her tone has now more color than of yore. She has more breadth and authority, and also more charm. . . . She gave a clear and most poetic reading of MacDowell's sonata.

(Boston Journal)

Olga Samaroff, the pianist, whom Boston appreciation started on the road to high honors, and Reinald Werrenrath, the New York baritone, entertained a rather large audience in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

To Mme. Samaroff the occasion was like a home-coming after a long absence. The audience gave her the friendliest sort of greeting and applauded her graceful yet vigorous playing with the warmest enthusiasm. . . . Her playing has gained considerably in feeling and vigor.

PHILADELPHIA

(Philadelphia Inquirer)

The real feature of the concert (Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra) and its most enjoyable and noteworthy incident was the admirable performance of Olga Samaroff of Tschaikowsky's great concerto for the piano in B flat minor. . . . Its original production in this city took place in the spring of 1889. Since then the concerto has been presented from time to time by all the leading pianists of the day, but if it was ever given with a greater breadth and power, with a more striking brilliancy, with a more moving eloquence or a more convincing sincerity of sentiment than it was by Mme. Samaroff yesterday afternoon, the occasion has escaped the writer's memory. In its authority and poise, in its technical sufficiency, its intellectual grasp and its emotional fervor, her interpretation of it was wholly satisfying and entirely admirable and the enthusiastic applause which it elicited was a well-deserved tribute to its worth.

(Philadelphia Press)

Remembering Mme. Samaroff's achievements of the past, and a natural curiosity to again hear her, drew one of the largest audiences of the season at the Academy.

Samaroff's playing was at times masculine in its force, and again tripping and delicate and of the most tender hue. She showed at all times absolute command, whether in the long staccato chords and octaves, or in the more delicate trills and long running movements, with every note properly timed and emphasized. Her tone was varied in color and reflected a very fine sensibility of the purposes of the composition.

(Philadelphia Public Ledger)

The outstanding feature of the concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra was the performance of Tschaikowsky's first concerto for piano and orchestra, by Olga Samaroff.

The enthusiasm that greeted her and repeatedly recalled her at the close bore witness to the novel place the soloist's personality and her art have won for her with the people of Philadelphia. No other performer of the season has received anything approaching the overwhelming cordiality of the demonstration.

If Mme. Stokowski had come among us utterly unheralded and unknown, her playing would have deserved the tribute paid it yesterday. She played wonderfully. In the technical elements of finger-work, rhythm and accent her work was distinguished, but in all she did there was the informing and inspiring leaven of the afflatus that it is beyond any teacher to communicate, for it must come from the depths of one's own being.

(Philadelphia Evening Bulletin)

Her reception yesterday afternoon was marked by both warmth and sincerity. The applause, in fact, was in the nature of a genuine ovation, with the additional compliment of numerous elaborate "floral tributes," including a large wreath, from the orchestra, and a huge basket of yellow chrysanthemums, presented by the members of the Women's Committee.

Apart from any element of social or personal favor that may have entered into her success, it may be said in calm judgment that Mme. Samaroff is capable of standing wholly upon her own merits as an artist, and that her playing yesterday was deserving of the resultant enthusiasm. The Tschaikowsky concerto is not the highest form of piano music, but its florid measures are imbued with the spirit of true melody, and its spectacular climaxes have the power of imparting a real thrill, when delivered with the brilliancy that Mme. Samaroff imparted to them yesterday.

Any over-assertiveness on the part of the solo instrument was soon done away with in yesterday's interpretation, however, in the pure sweetness of tone, the poetic sense of rhythm and the fluent ease of execution with which the pianist delivered her message. That Mme. Samaroff has not wasted, artistically, the three years of her retirement was evident in her playing of the Tschaikowsky composition. She has broadened in her command of technic, as shown in new repose and authority, and has added grace and charm to a delivery which always has been praised for these distinctive qualities.

(Philadelphia Evening Ledger)

Her reception, it should be noted, was the most cordial triumph yet achieved by an artist with the symphony orchestra, and it was abundantly deserved. Flowers banked one corner of the stage after the concerto, and Madam Samaroff was recalled again and again to acknowledge the gratification of the audience.

Starting molto maestoso, the concerto never once lost its tone of strong emotion. Mme. Samaroff played the first half of this movement with a deft and strong hand. It was as if to show, at the beginning and once for all, that if virtuosity was in question—pure technic—why, it was there and could be expected, and no one need bother about it. Before the first movement was over no one did bother. The question of Mme. Samaroff's technical ability is perilously insignificant in comparison with the ability she has to select, to emphasize and to understand the human feeling in her music.

To the swift changes of the concerto Mme. Samaroff showed herself extraordinarily sensitive. And then, to complete the circle, she has direct communication between understanding and expression. Her playing is not the most polished nor the most delicate. But it has a savor and a pungency that are precious. Her cantabile in the second movement and the leaping power of the last were memorable pieces of work.

Particular attention given to works of American composers and their products.

Oliver Ditson Company, Boston.

"OMNIPOTENCE," motet for men's voices, with solo part for tenor or soprano. Composed by Frederick Stevenson.

This brilliant, powerful, broad and wholly effective motet requires about ten minutes to perform, and will be found satisfactory when performed with the piano and organ part published in score form in the vocal score. The music is spontaneous and natural. It cannot fail to convince by its sincerity and spirit whenever it is properly rendered. The voice parts are only moderately difficult, and they do not demand voices of great range.

"MASS IN F," by J. L. Battmann.

This work has been edited and indexed as to cuts to make it conform with the motu proprio of His Holiness Pope Pius X. An English text by J. C. Johnson is printed underneath the Latin. The music is simple almost to childishness and is without distinction so far as harmony and counterpoint are concerned, but it is melodic and smooth. It can be learned by amateurs with very little rehearsal.

"HAKON THE STRONG," ballad for men's voices. By Gustave Lazarus.

This romantic work, which is full of color and throbs with dramatic power, requires about fifteen minutes to perform. It is possible to give the work with the piano accompaniment found in the vocal score, but it is evident that the composer intended the orchestra to be used, as there are many passages and effects that are clearly orchestral. The voice parts are by no means difficult, nor are the harmonies far fetched. In fact, the style of the work is a little old fashioned, but the diatonic melodies and the strong rhythm will make the music instantly comprehensible to the general public.

"SABBATH MORNING SERVICE FOR THE SYNAGOGUE," according to the Union Prayerbook. By James H. Rogers.

This music is simple and has an easy organ accompaniment. There are fourteen numbers in the volume, two of which have English words, and the remaining twelve, Hebrew.

Boosey & Company, New York.

"MAVIS," song, with words by L. A. Lefevre, music by Harold Craxton.

There is a little suggestion of the lilt of Swinburne in the lyrics, which doubtless had a good deal to do with stimulating the composer's melodic flow. At any rate, Harold Craxton has written a charming song with a refrain in the shape of an ingratiating valse lente. John McCormack is singing it with the greatest success.

"GOLDEN DAWN," song. Composed by Haydn Wood.

This is written in that broad, organlike style which characterizes so many English songs, and it is a happy mixture of sentiment and morality such as have made "The Lost Chord" so widely popular. Notwithstanding its popular style, however, it is well written by an excellent musician.

"LEAD THOU ME ON," sacred song. Words by Cardinal Newman, music by Edmund Yates.

In this new setting of the well known hymn which has made Cardinal Newman famous, there is little said that has not been said before by other composers. The music is smooth, melodic and vocally grateful, though the seven full pages of it are liable to prove monotonous to the ungodly who cannot bring religious fervor to their aid when listening to this lengthy monologue. The song has an effective organ accompaniment in addition to the usual piano part.

"The Fairy Pipers," a piano transcription of the dainty song which Clara Butt sang with so much effect during her recent American tour. The arranger has added nothing to the original, but has contented himself with transcribing the song exactly as it was composed. It is not difficult.

Breitkopf & Härtel, New York.

"IN THE MOUNTAINS," seven impressions, for the piano, composed by Walter W. Stockhoff, op. 2.

These compositions are redolent of the open air, the forest and the mountain. They are quite unconventional in harmony and rhythm, and their free and capricious melodies are somewhat puzzling when judged by academic standards. The names of the seven impressions are: "In the Solitude of the Mountain Fastness," "With the Trout," "The Hermit," "Merriment by a Brook," "The Indian," "The Ranchman," "The Stage Coach."

The mystery of the mountain is the keynote sounding throughout the music. Like all other new musical styles, this impressionistic style of Stockhoff's "In the Mountains" must be studied until it is familiar. This music will gain rather than lose by intimate study. It is not mere surface music that makes its best effect on one hearing.

Clayton F. Summy Company.

"ITALIAN SUITE," consisting of six characteristic pieces—"Venice, in a Gondola"; "Florentine Serenade"; "To the Ancient Gods"; "In Rome, Ave Maria"; "Neapolitan Romance"; "On Capri, Tarantelle." Composed for violin and piano by Adolf Weidig.

These are simple and melodious pieces for violin students who are advanced enough to begin the musical part of their work. The pieces all lie within the range of the first position, and there are no passages of any difficulty and no double notes. Each composition is fingered and bowed, and otherwise ready to be given to the pupil. There ought to be a demand for just such practical music as this "Italian" suite.

Four songs—"WOODLAND LOVE SONG," "THE DEAD FLOWER," "BLIND," "SPHINX." Composed by Paul Tietjens.

These interesting songs occupy a position midway between the ordinary ballad and the high class art song. They are well written, melodious, moderately difficult and have telling climaxes. In style, however, they are not beyond the taste of the general public, and they require no special cultivation for their just appreciation.

"EQUALIZING EXERCISES FOR ALL SCALES," a scale and arpeggio book for piano study. By George Bailhé.

This volume of exercises is strongly recommended by Moritz Moszkowski, Joseph Lhevinne and Isidor Philipp, whose letters are reproduced at the beginning of the album. The object of the work is to concentrate the attention of the pupil on the most essential exercises, with the object of gaining as much technical skill as possible in the shortest time. There are forty-four pages in the book, consisting entirely of exercises.

Shattuck Describes Paris Conditions.

Arthur Shattuck, the American pianist, arrived in New York, December 19, after an absence of two years. His tour of the United States includes appearances with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Chicago Symphony, Cincinnati Symphony, Minneapolis Symphony and St. Louis Symphony orchestras and many recital engagements. When asked about conditions in Europe, Mr. Shattuck said:

"I stayed in Paris until it seemed as if the French capital was about to fall and then made my escape to England where a number of concert engagements had been arranged before the war began and which, much to my surprise, were not cancelled in spite of the tragedy which hangs over all Europe.

ARTHUR SHATTUCK,
On the temporary fortifications outside Paris, showing the extra precaution taken to protect the French sentinels.

"About six weeks ago I returned to Paris and was brought in close contact with the gloom of this deadly struggle. We in America cannot realize the awful result of the war. The gaiety of Paris is gone as if it never existed. The theatres are all closed. There is no music in the restaurants. There are no concerts, no amusements of any kind—not even a moving picture show. Very few shops are open and little business is being done."

Philadelphia Orchestra Concerts.

Bach was the principal contributor to the tenth pair of concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy of Music last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Despite the handicap of inclement weather conditions and counter holiday attractions, both concerts were attended by large audiences, which showed pronounced appreciation of the work of both Leopold Stokowski and his men and Harold Bauer, the soloist.

The appreciation was surely well warranted, for higher standards of orchestral interpretation hardly could have been asked by the most severe of critics or given by human ensemble. Bauer was the assisting pianist in the Bach triple concerto in D major for piano, flute and violin. His associates were Thaddeus Rich and Daniel Maquarre. Despite its somewhat pretentious form this composition is not one of the master works of the musical father, but it was well performed. Bauer played also the symphonic variations of César Franck. Mr. Stokowski and his men completed the program with the "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart and Grieg's atmospheric "Sigurd Jorsalfar."

H. P. QUICKSALL.

Tuneless Statesmen.

In a hitherto unpublished letter George Washington wrote the following: "I can neither sing one of the songs nor raise a single note on any musical instrument." The Father of his Country's inability either to sing or play calls attention to the very few great Americans who were gifted in that way. Lincoln was full of humor, but devoid of all musical talent. Grant's famous remark was that he knew but two tunes, "One was 'Yankee Doodle' and the other wasn't."

Franklin experimented with an instrument which when fitted into an open window would be softly played by the wind. But he could not sing and was unable to perform well on any musical instrument.

America's four most conspicuous living Americans—Woodrow Wilson, W. J. Bryan, Theodore Roosevelt and William H. Taft—are musicless. Jackson, Benton, Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Sumner, Seward, Blaine, Cleveland, Sherman, John Marshall, Madison, Monroe—of which one did you ever read that he was a singer or even a fairly good instrumental musician?

And take the great capitalists—Girard, Astor, the first important Vanderbilt, Jay Gould, J. P. Morgan, A. J. Drexel, Andrew Carnegie, John D. Rockefeller—who could sing or play well a violin or piano? Thomas Jefferson was an excellent violinist, and in being that he is conspicuous on America's honor roll.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Emma Loeffler Sings for Pleiades Club.

Emma Loeffler, the soprano, was a soloist at a meeting of the Pleiades Club, which was held Sunday, December 20, at the Brevoort Hotel, New York. The affair was most delightful, and Miss Loeffler's rendering of her portion of the program was thoroughly enjoyed. Her voice is of a lovely quality, which, combined with intelligent interpretations and a charming personality, make her a favorite with concert goers.

Sorrentino's Trials Abroad.

Umberto Sorrentino arrived last week after a series of mishaps, including an arrest on the Italian frontier, missing his boat, missing his train, and other exciting experiences. He had no passport, and as an officer of the Italian army, it was difficult for him, as he says, to "make a getaway."

UMBERTO SORRENTINO.

In trouble as he was, he was glad to see Albert Bigelow Paine, the well-known writer, who rushed to his friend Sorrentino, and used his good offices to get him on board the steamer Re d'Italia. On the boat he found the manager of his Italian operatic tour, during which he sang in "Elisir d'Amore," "Don Pasquale," "Barber of Seville," etc. This manager has re-engaged him for next season.

Mr. Sorrentino's season promises well, notwithstanding his late arrival, and various clubs and societies have booked him, all of which will be duly noted, for his appearances always cause much favorable comment; indeed, among the various women's societies, the proper word to designate his appearance is "flutter," such is the effect of his winning personality and beautiful voice.

Bridgeport Music.

Bridgeport, Conn., December 12, 1914.

A very interesting lecture-recital was given by Adele Laeis Baldwin recently before the members of the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club when the gifted contralto was ably supported by Paul Tietjens, universally known as the composer of the "Wizard of Oz." As two of Mr. Tietjens' songs were included in the program, he was prevailed upon to preside at the piano, and Bridgeport was thus given an opportunity to see and hear this versatile composer in the field of serious art.

The first part of the program was devoted to a paper on "Diction in Song and Speech," in which Mme. Baldwin revealed a remarkably thorough knowledge of her subject. Her own absolute control of the mechanism of the voice and her wide experience as a teacher of diction in many languages made it possible for her to give her listeners many concrete illustrations of her theories. It was a most instructive and authoritative paper.

A group of songs followed, in which Mme. Baldwin displayed her beautiful contralto voice through the medium of a remarkably finished technic. To Mr. Tietjens' "Blind" and Spross' "Lorraine Loree," she gave the full force of her dramatic abilities in support of her wonderful organ, attaining in each a most effective climax. Her renditions of two very difficult numbers, Rachmaninoff's "Floods of Spring" and Mr. Tietjens' "Woodland Love Song" were further proofs of her mastery of her art and were received with especial appreciation by her audience.

Paul Tietjens made his appearance in the role of accompanist, and lent an added charm to each number with his sympathetic insight and admirable contact with the mood of the singer.

After the concert an informal reception was given in honor of the two artists by Susan Hawley Davis, the well known contralto and vocal teacher, at her delightful studio in one of Bridgeport's most interesting old colonial homes. Here the artists were again prevailed upon to delight their listeners. Mrs. Davis was assisted in receiving her guests by Mrs. de Ver H. Warner, Mrs. Fred Atwater, Corrall Sterling and Marion Munson, of New Haven.

WHY NOT A MUNICIPAL ORGAN FOR NEWARK?

In Commemoration of the City's 250th Anniversary a Municipal Building Is to Be Erected—The Sunday Call Asks "Why Not a Municipal Organ?"

DANIEL E. HERVEY, WELL KNOWN COMPOSER, AUTHOR AND CRITIC IS DEAD.

Newark, N. J., December 28, 1914.

Three-quarters of a page in the Sunday Call of December 27 issue is devoted to the question "Why Not a Municipal Organ for Newark?" The article, well illustrated, reads in part: "Shall Newark have a municipal memorial building, which shall contain a great organ to commemorate the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the city? That anniversary is less than two years distant, and the answer to this question should be given at once, for if it should be affirmative no time is to be lost in beginning the work."

In answer to the question of the Sunday Call, and as a loyal supporter of all things pertaining to the advancement of music in Newark, the writer also asks "Why not?" For a long time musicians of the city have discussed the possibility of a municipal concert hall which would be large enough to house such affairs as the Saengerfest, the Newark Music Festival and concerts given by celebrated artists or large societies. Newark has no hall suitable for such events; Krueger Auditorium is not large enough and the Armory does not answer the purpose. The proposed new building ought to and probably will contain a large auditorium in which such festivals and concerts can be held. If this is decided upon a great organ should be installed so that free public concerts can be given in winter and summer for the entertainment and education of the thousands of music lovers of the city, who would unquestionably support such concerts even at a nominal charge of admission. Why cannot such a scheme be carried out?

DANIEL E. HERVEY DEAD.

Daniel E. Hervey, a member of the staff of the Sunday Call since its organization forty-two years ago, and for many years its musical critic, died suddenly last Saturday. A man of rare attainments, the loss of Mr. Hervey will mean a great deal to the music lovers of Newark. While there is always some one to step into another's place, there are probably few, if any, persons who can win the esteem and respect of the citizens of a community as Mr. Hervey has. "His familiarity with the [illegible] classic and modern," says the Call editorially [illegible] markable. . . . No mean musician himself, his critical capacity was far beyond the ordinary and his knowledge of the science and history of the art comprehensive. Mr. Hervey was a good citizen, a good man, a good father and a good husband." For ten years he was editor of Frank Leslie's Sunday Magazine, in addition to his work in connection with numerous other periodicals and newspapers; he was a veteran of the Civil War, and has been a member of many church choirs, as singer, organist and choirmaster; he has composed a great deal of music, both sacred and secular, which has been published in book and sheet music form, besides many compositions yet unpublished. Only a few days ago he sent the 1915 edition of the American Church Almanac, of which he was editor, to press, and up to the time of his death was active in numerous branches of literary and musical work. He was an enthusiastic supporter of the Newark Music Festival and only recently expressed his intention of joining the chorus as one of the singers. He was progressive in his ideas and an earnest worker. This loss of Mr. Hervey means much to Newark and to its music lovers, and in years to come at least one figure, beloved and respected, will be missed as musical events of the seasons come and go.

FESTIVAL CHORUS REHEARSALS.

On Wednesday evening next, December 30, the Newark Festival Chorus will hold its weekly rehearsal. On this occasion, however, only the first hour will be devoted to the rehearsal, the latter part of the evening being taken up with the monthly musical program provided by members of the choral body. An attractive program has been arranged.

The Jersey City Festival Chorus will resume its weekly rehearsals in the Lincoln High School on January 7. A full attendance is expected.

MUSIC NOTES.

Over 500 men, women and children, in spite of the cold weather, gathered around the brilliantly illumined Christmas tree provided by the Community Christmas Committee of Montclair last Saturday night. The singing of the "Community Choir" was a pleasing feature of the affair. It is planned to make this celebration in Montclair an annual event.

PROSPERITY IS ON THE WAY

Charles M. Schwab, who returned Wednesday night from his second trip in two months to Great Britain, made the following statement to the newspapers:

"The prosperity which I foretold before for the United States will be here in force," he said: "I wish to reiterate my previous statement that an era of revived business activity is coming. The improvement will be immediate, due to the fact that European nations have placed orders valued at $300,000,000 for merchandise to be delivered within a year in this country. From now on I expect to see a steady improvement in business."

NEWS FROM VARIOUS CITIES

Lincoln.

Lincoln, Neb., December 17, 1914.

The second number on the Artists' Course offered by the University School of Music was the organ recital given at the First Presbyterian Church by Clarence Eddy, who was enthusiastically greeted by a large assembly of music students, instructors and lovers of high class music. There are perhaps no more peaceful and soul satisfying selections than Frysinger's "At Twilight," Federlein's "Sunset," Harrison's "Supplication" and Matthew's "Evening Song," as played by Mr. Eddy at this time. The program contained a number of novelties and all were well received.

Vocalists and admirers of truly beautiful singing were very much in evidence when Louise Jansen-Wylie appeared at the Temple Theatre, before the Matinee Musicale. A beautiful woman, possessing splendid vocal gifts, and a temperament capable of grasping every phase of a varied program is a rare combination. But such was the case on this occasion. Prolonged applause evidenced the deep appreciation of the combination. Sympathetic accompaniments were supplied by Mrs. Howard Kennedy. The program: "Morgenhymme," Henschel; "Mädchens Wünsch," Chopin; "Vergebliches Ständchen," Brahms; "Zueignung," Strauss; "Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces," Young; "The Swan Bent Low," MacDowell; "A Maid Sings Light," MacDowell; "Norwegian Love Song," Clough-Leighter; "Chere Nuit," Bachelet; aria, "Tosca," "Non la sospirl," Puccini; "Sylvelin," Sinding; "The Spring's Blue Eyes," Duffield; "Ah, Love but a Day," Beach; "The Fairy Pipers," Brewer; "Ecstasy," Rummel.

Lincoln Musical College is justly proud of having Aloys Kremer as a member of its faculty. Mr. Kremer, who is a growing factor in the West, gave a program recently worthy of a great deal of attention, for it covered a wide range. His well rounded technic was ever to the fore and his portrayal of the emotional element made a deep impression on the large audience. Numerous encores were granted. These were his numbers: Sonata in B minor, Chopin; "Liebestraume," No. 3, Liszt; "Islamey" (fantasia orientale), Balakirew; "Carnaval," op. 9, Schumann.

A delighted audience greeted John P. Prince at his annual entertainment. It is almost impossible in a few words to express the satisfaction of it all—the novelty, the appropriate appointments and the deep insight into the selection of characters. Mr. Prince's portrayal of Canadian frontier life would be hard to equal. For eighteen years he lived among these people, which partially accounts for his fine interpretation. He was ably assisted by Mrs. Prince and a number of his students. Mr. Prince takes high rank among modern teachers of dramatic work. Excellent entre-act music was furnished by the Junior Orchestra of the University School of Music, under Mr. Locb.

The Morning Musical Review is presenting some fine programs this winter. The study of the music of France has been thorough and very interesting. At the home of Mrs. Carl Stein, a splendid program was presided over by Miss Malone, after which refreshments were served by the hostess. A continuation of the study was made at the home of Mrs. Lynn Lloyd, Thursday, December 10, when Mrs. Schloss presided. Numbers were given by Mrs. Thomas Callanan, Miss Malone, Miss Zumwinkle, Mrs. Fred Foster, Mrs. Schloss, Mrs. Fred Funke, Mrs. Enslow, Mrs. Carl Stein and Mrs. Alexander. After a luncheon the club adjourned to meet in January.

Before an audience of over 1,000 members of the Woman's Club, August Hagenow presented a program of violin music which brought forth great applause for the excellence of its rendition. Special mention must be made of the "Romance," by Konrad Kriedmann, which had its initial performance and which is dedicated to Mr. Hagenow. Because of its innate musical worth, it will doubtless be in great demand when published. The entire program, with Marjory Anderson at the piano, was attractive and the interpretation was excellent throughout.

The recital given by Miss Sexton, organist, assisted by Jude Deyo, contralto, and Eula Marshal, soprano, was enjoyed by a large audience of Musical Art Club members and their guests at the Second Presbyterian Church. Miss Sexton has a pronounced talent and gave a heavy program. Miss Marshal possesses a lyric soprano voice of wide range and fine interpretive powers. Miss Deyo's voice is of a deep rich quality and is much in demand.

A number of very attractive concerts have been given by Mr. Molzer, violinist, and the Trio Melodique, consisting of Mrs. Molzer, Lillian Eiche and Miss Burlingim. At the Sunday afternoon recitals at All Souls' Church great enthusiasm has been shown. On November 27 they presented an artistic program at Deshler, Neb., under the auspices of the Lutheran High School and Business College. This was a complete success.

The Beethoven symphonies under the direction of Carrie B. Raymond have been a success and very well attended. The third symphony will be given in January.

The annual presentation of portions of "The Messiah" occurred during Convocation, December 17, at the State University, the first of the Christmas activities. A chorus of 120 voices proved well directed and well balanced. The unusual feature of more men's voices than women's was noticeable and is most encouraging. The soloists were Annette Abbott, soprano; Mrs. Arthur Gutzmer, contralto; Charles L. Bagley, tenor, who did creditable work. The accompaniments and pastoral symphony were given by Mrs. Molzer and E. J. Walt, violins; W. T. Quick, viola; Lillian Eiche, cello; V. Larson, cornet; E. C. Mickel, trombone, and Miss Burlingin, organist.

Sidney Silber and Carl Steckelberg gave successful concerts at Seward and Crete this month.

The Lincoln Musical College has opened a branch school at Fairbury with a competent faculty.

◈ ◈ ◈

Misses Robbins and Kinscella, of the University School of Music, gave the first number on the lecture course at Omaha under the auspices of the Y. W. C. A.

Jude Deyo was the vocal soloist at the Elks' Memorial, December 6. Her rendition of "Eye Hath Not Seen," by Gaul, was both artistic and appealing.

The first students' recital of Wesleyan Conservatory was given December 10 and proved to be creditable. The Wesleyan Male Quartet has been making good and has a full season ahead of it.

The season of grand opera by the San Carlo Company was the event of the second week of December. "Lucia," "Carmen," "Faust" and "Rigoletto" were given to enthusiastic audiences.

Mrs. Downing, of Chicago, presented "Pipes o' Pan" before the Matinee Musicale, December 14. The poem is by Cecil Fanning and music by Mrs. Downing. It was a novel and successful event.

El Paso.

El Paso, Tex., December 19, 1914.

About a year ago H. E. van Surdam, who has taken quite a leading part in local musicales in El Paso, organized a symphony orchestra of twenty-five pieces, and gave one concert during December, 1913. Since then he has secured more musicians and has increased his orchestra to forty men, and gave a delightful concert at the Crawford Theatre on the afternoon of December 18 to "S. R. O." The best people in El Paso were present. The following program was performed: March, "World Peace," Zamecnik; song, "At Dawning," Cadman, sung by H. E. van Surdam; "Peeer Gynt" suite, Grieg; tone poem, "Eleanor," Jessie Deppen; selection, "I'm a-Longing for You," Jane Hathaway; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; incidental solos by L. E. Faget (cello), F. Havers (clarinet) and R. Garcia (flute). This concert was free to the public, for H. E. van Surdam wanted to interest the people in his orchestra. A large number of well to do citizens have subscribed annually to this orchestra. Mr. van Surdam intends to give two concerts, one in January and one in February, 1915. He will rehearse his men from time to time, and hopes by next winter to have increased the orchestra to fifty pieces and make it a permanent institution.

The different churches are making big preparations for Christmas song services.

The high school children gave Verdi's "Trovatore" at the high school building recently, the children singing the choruses, while the solos were taken by leading local vocalists. This is the fifth grand opera that the high school students have given during the last few years.
